SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. E. P. McAdams, pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

Great Eternal God, Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier of Men, graciously look down upon this assembly opening its deliberations in Thy name.

Remember that in spite of the waywardness of the nations and individuals, the representatives of the people of the United States and its possessions have always maintained their living faith in Thy power and love and a consciousness of their dependence upon Thee.

We pray Thee, then, to infuse into their minds the spirit of wisdom to seek and to apprehend the truth, the spirit of counsel, and fortitude to enact those measures which will best serve the Nation's interest and will direct this Nation along those ways which will enable its citizens to pursue that peace and good will which was broadcast first by angels for the Infant King and again by Himself personally on the day of His resurrection.

We bow our heads and hearts asking Thy benign benediction upon this humble and sincere protestation of our loyalty, whilst we repeat the prayer which Thou thyself has given us, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MEMORIAL DAY ADDRESS AT ANTIETAM BATTLEFIELD

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a historical address delivered by the gentleman from Idaho, Mr. THOMAS C. COFFIN, on Decoration Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with permission granted me, I include herewith the remarks of my colleague Mr. COFFIN, of Idaho, on the occasion of the memorial services at the battlefield of Antietam, delivered at Sharpsburg, Md., on Memorial Day.

The privilege which has been accorded me of taking part with you in these memorial services here today can have come to me only as an expression of that great courtesy which distinguishes the people of Maryland. To one like myself, a native of the great West, whose pioneer builders came in almost equal proportions from those who wore the blue and those who wore the gray during the great War between the States, it is possible only to look upon this spot, one of the outstanding milestones in our national history, from a standpoint which those of you more intimately connected with that great struggle, through environment and tradition, may possibly not entirely appreciate. To me the armies which contended here over 70 years ago were composed entirely of countrymen of mine who, in that generation, found a resort to arms the only means by which a disputed question of constitutional development could be decided.

As we come here on Memorial Day, we come as Americans, proud of the opportunity to pay our tribute of respect to those who made the supreme sacrifice in defense of principles in which they honestly believed and which in the ultimate were decided, not by force of arms but by the power and the direction of a Divine Providence, the purpose of which has become more clearly discernible as the years go by.

In the sense in which history is teaching us to look upon the battle that was fought here in September 1862 we are coming more and more to realize the omnipresence of a divine guiding hand in the destinies of this Nation. We are coming to realize that Antietam stands out as one of those whitehot forges wherein the power that fashions order out of chaos was most active.

To me the significance of Antietam on this day, so long after the tide of war flowed across the spot whereon we stand, is that of a milestone in the development of this great country, which all of us now enjoy. It is as such that we of this generation should be eternally thankful to those brave men of an earlier generation who struggled here that our national destinies might be fulfilled.

When the forces of Robert E. Lee and George B. McClellan met at South Mountain and in and around Sharpsburg, at Antietam Creek, there were opposed to each other probably the finest armies that had ever been developed in the history of the world up to that time, and certainly the two outstanding military geniuses of the Civil War. In practically every conception having to do with our country, Robert E. Lee and George B. McClellan differed only as the environment from which they came differed. To each of them the issue of the Civil War, up to that time, was the same. It did not concern the institution of slavery but rather in the broad constitutional sense it concerned the character of Federal Union which had been born with the American Constitution. It concerned nothing more than the right of one of the sovereign States, by its own action, to dissolve the contract by which it was bound to the other sovereign States as an American Union.

Had the war ended by the complete triumph of General McClellan at Antietam, and had General McClellan remained a dominating figure in the days that would have followed there can be little doubt that the dark and tragic days of the reconstruction period would have been avoided and the price which this country has paid in the long period of prejudice and partisanship could, to a large extent, have also been avoided.

Not far from here, upon the Union left, on September 17, 1862, was stationed General Burnside with between 10,000 and 12,000 men. Owing to the fierce fighting which was going on on the Union right and center, General Lee had found it necessary to withdraw all but a very few of the men upon his extreme right facing Burnside. That was a movement which General McClellan had anticipated and had sought to bring about, and with the knowledge that the strategy in that respect was having the desired edge that the strategy in that respect was having the desired result, he ordered Burnside, even at the point of the bayonet, if necessary, and regardless of the loss of life that might be entailed, to advance across Antietam Creek and on the rear of Sharpsburg to the end that he might interpose a wedge between the Confederate center and the reinforcements that were hurrying from Harpers Ferry. Although the Confederate position, as official reports now very clearly demonstrate, was held by probably not to exceed 500 men, Burnside was delayed for hours; and although opposed by this meager handful of Confederates, suffered in the neighborhood of 2,000 casualties.

Before the movement ordered by McClellan had actually been accomplished, the division hurrying from Harpers Ferry had arrived upon the field and the opportunity to have made Antietam a complete and crushing Union victory was lost. As one analyzes the movement that took place upon that day, it is difficult, indeed, to understand why the orders repeatedly given to General Burnside by General McClellan were not carried out. The fact remains, they were not carried out, and the fact remains that Antietam goes down in history as the bloodiest single day's battle ever fought upon this continent, but without any ultimately decisive results. Following this great battle, General McClellan, by a march and by strategy that military experts and students are coming to regard as one of the really great military feats in our history, placed himself in a position before Culpeper Courthouse, where he could have dealt with the armies of Longstreet and Jackson separately, and where both of those great Confederate commanders realized that their positions were most precarious. Again was interposed that force which seems to have dominated every movement in the war between the States, and McClellan, whom General Lee, years after the war, described as the ablest Union commander he was called upon to face, was removed from the command of the army and supplanted by Burnside, who immediately neutralized the favorable position in which McClellan had placed the Union Army and permitted the joining of Longstreet and Jackson, almost without firing a shot. It would almost seem that it was predestined that the war between the States was to continue until the blood and treasure of this Nation had been poured out without stint and the long aftermath, the end of which we are only now beginning to see, was left to plague our people.

Antietam marked the first of the titanic struggles of the Civil War which were apparently destined to be indecisive and to be, and to remain, but one of those pages of frightful carnage from the 4 years' trial out of which our more perfect Union was to be consolidated.

Slightly less than a year later occurred a similar episode in our history when the 3 days of battle at Gettysburg again resulted in a stalemate. At Gettysburg, however, it was the interposition of fortuitous and unforeseen and unforeseeable circumstances that prevented the decisive defeat of the Union Army.

And again, 2 years later, although in a much lesser degree, from the standpoint of the men engaged, the delay administered to General Early at Monocacy rendered indecisive a thrust by General Lee which failed by hours only. Again, it was the interposition of unforeseen and unforeseeable circumstances that resulted in great loss of life and another stalemate.

It was only in the following year that Grant, with an utter disregard for the loss in human life that might be entailed, made slaughter the order of the day to end the great holocaust.

Following in the train of these bloody, and increasingly bloody years, there grew up that intolerable sentiment, without which the cankerworm of reconstruction days would never have been imposed upon the South.

In the almost 70 years which have elapsed since Appomattox, in varying degree, we have felt the aftermath of the passions and the prejudices that had their roots in this conflict between the States. As we look back over that long period we fail to discern a single time, until the past 2 years, when it could truly be said that the administration of our country was national in its scope. With every new administration we have been made to feel that sectionalism, born of the War between the States, was one of the controlling features in the elevation of one of our citizens to the Presidency. We of today are the first, since the days of the Civil War, who can truly say that our national administration is one dependent upon no section and no class for either its existence or its support. Our country has returned to the position which it occupied before the War between the States in that our national policies and our national destinies can once again be directed and controlled by an administration representing industrial New England and the North and East, as well as the great southern section and the great undeveloped West. We stand today for the first time in a position where we can honestly say that the passions and the prejudices born of our great internal struggle no longer control our national policy or mold or modify it in any respect. Today we can look back upon our national travail, which began at Antietam, and can almost feel that the Divine Providence in whose special keeping have been the destinies of this Nation has completed the task of molding a finer and a more perfect instrument of government for the benefit of all the people—North, South, and West.

STATE OF NEBRASKA

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask a question. It is the intention of the gentleman from Nebraska to call up a bill authorizing the issuance of a duplicate check for $10,451.12, which it is asserted has been lost. The bill as drawn provides that this duplicate $10,451.12 check shall be issued without the requirement of an indemnity bond.

If the gentleman will accept an amendment changing the word "without" to "with", thereby incorporating in the bill the requirement for indemnity bond to protect the Government, there will be no objection to the bill; but there ought to be an indemnity bond to protect the Government, because there is outstanding a check for $10,451.12 which somebody might get hold of and cash. Such things have happened in the past; so the Government must be protected.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Texas, and I shall offer an amendment providing that there shall be an indemnity bond.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, on the 17th of last January the Department of Agriculture issued a check to the treasurer of the State of Nebraska for $10,451.12, which check the Department of Agriculture and the treasurer of the State report has been lost in the mails, destroyed, or stolen; at any rate, it has disappeared. At the request of the Secretary of Agriculture I have introduced this bill; and the form of the bill is the form the Secretary of Agriculture sent to me. Since the gentleman from Texas has called attention to the fact that the bill as drawn reads "without the requirement of an indemnity bond", I shall offer an amendment to strike out the word "without" and insert in lieu thereof the word "with."

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the Treasury Department approve this bill?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. This bill comes from the Secretary of Agriculture and also from the treasurer of the State of Nebraska. The check is from the Department of Agriculture to the treasurer of the State of Nebraska.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of section 3646, as amended, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the disbursing clerk of the Department of Agriculture is authorized and directed to issue, without the requirement of an indemnity bond, a duplicate of original check numbered 15757, drawn January 17, 1934, in favor of "State treasurer of Nebraska trust fund" for $10,451.12 and lost, stolen, or miscarried in the mails.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHALLENBERGER: Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "without" and insert in lieu thereof the word "with."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, H.R. 9820, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RICHMOND PEARSON HOBSON

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3380) providing for the appointment of Richmond Pearson Hobson, formerly a captain in the United States Navy, as a rear admiral in the Navy, and his retirement in that grade, and immediately consider the same.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what this does and how much extra cost it involves?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I will endeavor to inform the House on the objects and purposes of this bill.

The purpose is to permit the resident to commission Captain Hobson as an admiral in the line, and automatically and immediately retire him and place him upon the retired list of the Navy. The total cost to the Government will be $4,500 a year.

I may say that today is the thirty-sixth anniversary of the sinking of the collier Merrimac in the War with Spain, and it is indeed appropriate that this character of recognition should be accorded Captain Hobson at this time. The bill has been unanimously passed by the Senate, and, after a long and careful hearing by the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, it was unanimously reported to the House. I am asking the House now to consent to the immediate consideration of this bill and to unanimously enact the same.

Thirty-six years ago tonight, while the United States was at war with Spain, the United States collier Merrimac, under heavy fire from forts and ships, was taken into the harbor and sunk in the channel of Santiago de Cuba.

ASSETS FOR THE NAVY AND THE NATION

Mr. Speaker, this legislation on the anniversary of the sinking of the Merrimac in many ways is unique. Extensive hearings held by subcommittees of the Naval Affairs Committees of both Houses brought out facts around which hang high values constituting assets to the naval service, to the country, to humanity, and especially to the youth of this and other generations.

While delays due to the congestion on our Private Calendar permitted the Senate to pass the bill first, the House by the delay has this anniversary for its day, and feels a more intimate relationship, as the commander of the Merrimac was from 1907 to 1915 a Member of the House from Alabama. A few of our older Members remember him with admiration and affection. We hardly realized at the time the far-reaching significance of his tireless work in the Committee on Naval Affairs—one result of which was the establishment of the Office of Chief of Naval Operations, in the face of the disapproval of the Secretary of the Navy. Highest authorities have testified that this office alone produced the efficiency that enabled us to get our armies overseas in time to save the World War to the Allies. It is realized now in all responsible quarters that in this Office of Naval Operations is bound up the efficiency of our Navy in the wars that the future has in store for America.

THE WORLD WAR AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

The older Members remember how they considered lightly the warning that Captain Hobson sounded year after year of the approach of the World War as he pleaded for building up the Navy so that America could be the great neutral, able to exert powerful influence to prevent the World War, and if it came, to inspire respect for our rights as a neutral by both sides and thus to safeguard the rights of all neutrals and of civilization. This policy of a peace-loving nation, far from the hatred and strife of other lands, but holding power adequate for our own home defense and the defense of our commerce and vital interests everywhere, is as sound for America now as it was then. The older Members recall the persistency with which Captain Hobson pointed out the rising importance to America's peace of the control of the sea in the Pacific, and the positive danger of letting that control pass to foreign hands. It was Captain Hobson who secured the authorization of the naval base at Pearl Harbor and raised his voice for the strong fortification of the Panama Canal, and urged year in and year out the assembling of the Navy into one great fleet with its home in the Pacific Ocean.

HOBSON AND AIR POWER

The older Members recall the incident when the Democratic floor leader, John Sharp Williams, shortly after the first feeble flight of the Wright brothers, taunted his young kinsman, Captain Hobson, with being such a Navy jingo that he would put a fleet in the air as well as on the sea. Captain Hobson's answer was:

> I expect to see the day when great fleets will carry on in the air, and my hope shall be that America in that day will be in aviation the biggest and the best.

It would not be amiss in these days for Congress to give consideration to Captain Hobson's up-to-date formula for our safety—America as a minimum to maintain power on the sea second to none, and simultaneously power in the air adequate to control the air out to midocean on both oceans at the same time.

Mr. Speaker, in the course of the hearings on this bill, many features of the first order came out in line with the Navy traditions. It was the first time that a naval constructor was ever included in the staff of a fleet at sea. Captain Hobson brought this about against strong opposition. Sending naval constructors to sea is now an established practice.

NAVAL CONSTRUCTORS AT SEA

The practical advantages came out in many ways in most cases for the first time in any navy. The improvising, placing, and securing of the torpedoes on the Merrimac and the hawser and stops for the bow anchor, applied as in the launching of a ship; elaborate calculations of stability in damaged condition applied to battle tactics; cutting out woodwork, throwing inflammables overboard, reorganizing fire mains and fire conditions for battle; conquering buoyancy sufficient to float the beached Spanish flagship Maria Teresa.

Mr. Speaker, it was 49 years ago, Monday of last week, May 21, 1885, when Midshipman Hobson entered Annapolis. His 4 years' training there, standing first in his class, its youngest member holding the highest position in the corps, and his subsequent training for 3 years in the French Government's postgraduate schools for its engineers, graduating there with honor, seem to have brought forth a scientific method that makes Captain Hobson especially helpful and reliable in approaching unsolved problems, especially his insistence upon exhaustive research to establish the facts, holding conclusions and questions of judgment and of policy in abeyance.

HOBSON AND ALCOHOL EDUCATION

Older Members recall his research into the properties of ethyl alcohol and his classic speech in Congress, called "The Great Destroyer", and the permanent influence his distribution of millions of copies of this speech had in promoting real temperance among our people.

Few are aware that he disappeared from the prohibition picture because the drys rejected and scorned his earnest pleadings for alcohol education, thoroughly organized and sustained, to be made the policy, leaving legislation to follow naturally on the heels of education and public sentiment. Better it would have been for them and for the country if the drys had followed his counsel instead of plunging into the opposite policy of radical legislation and the neglect of alcohol education.

HOBSON AND THE WORLD DOPE RING

It came out in the hearings, though few of us are aware, that for 12 years this American has headed up scientific warfare against the world illicit narcotic drug traffic, through founding and directing the International Narcotic Education Association (incorporated, California, headquarters Los Angeles) and the World Narcotic Defense Association (incorporated, New York, headquarters New York City and Geneva, Switzerland). Until these organizations appeared the great dope ring of the world was unchecked in its ruthless exploitation of mankind, running roughshod over all the efforts of individual nations and their groupings. A 6-year drive culminated in a great treaty convention going into effect last summer and now operating in 42 nations. In the brief time that has elapsed the cost of morphine in the illicit traffic in America has gone up more than 500 percent, and is still rising. This tells the tale of the effectiveness of this American scientific leadership in this warfare, regarded formerly as hopeless.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when the gentleman states this will cost $4,500, does he mean that is in addition to the retired pay which Captain Hobson would have otherwise drawn as a retired captain in the Navy?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No. Captain Hobson does not draw retired pay at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. No; but he would be retired?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What would his retired pay be if he were retired in the grade of a captain?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It would be identically the same after 20 years' service. If Captain Hobson had been retired instead of resigning from the Navy, he would have been entitled after 30 years' service to $4,500 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. As a captain in the Navy?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This does not increase the pay that he would have drawn as a retired captain after 30 years' service?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the thirty-sixth anniversary of the sinking of the Merrimac?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I think he deserves this belated recognition, and I shall not object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am in a rather peculiar situation with reference to this request, and I do not know whether I should make this statement or not, but those who were familiar with political conditions in Alabama a number of years ago will recall that Captain Hobson and I had quite a contest when I first came to Congress. This is merely a personal statement, but it gives me gratification on this anniversary of the heroic exploit of Captain Hobson to appeal to all of my colleagues on the floor of this House to grant this consent to the passage of the bill. I trust no objection will be offered.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Captain Hobson has not been drawing pay from the Government since he resigned?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman from Oklahoma is correct. Captain Hobson has never drawn one dollar of pay, because he resigned his commission in the Navy on account of his health.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. I think the recognition of Captain Hobson at this time is entirely proper, although belated. May I ask the chairman of the committee if any recognition has been given to the other participants in the sinking of the Merrimac? For instance, Ensign Joseph Wright Powell commanded the launch that was under fire for some hours in broad daylight, and I understand brought Captain Hobson out.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No. The captain was captured by the Spaniards and stayed in prison until after the Battle of Santiago.

Mr. CULKIN. I stand corrected, but the launch commanded by Ensign Powell was under fire of the Spanish fleet and shore batteries for some hours after daylight came.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Some years ago one of the men who accompanied Captain Hobson reenlisted in the Navy and later on deserted. This man was given an honorable discharge. We cleared his record and put him back in good standing so far as pension rights and other considerations were concerned.

Mr. CULKIN. I earnestly urge consideration of Ensign Powell and his gallant men who were in this open launch and who remained under fire for some hours in broad daylight. They made a brave but futile attempt to bring off Captain Hobson.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That has not yet been presented to the House.

Mr. CULKIN. I trust the committee will consider that matter to the end that Ensign Powell and his associates may be given their proper place in history.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. May I say to the Members of the House that this bill does not carry any back pay whatsoever. If the President approves this bill, the captain is put upon the retired list as an admiral of the lower half, and he will commence to draw retired pay from the date he goes on the retired list.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. May I say that this was one of the outstanding acts of great heroism in the history of our country. Captain Hobson volunteered for this dangerous service. In other countries, such as Great Britain, when their citizens and subjects have done heroic acts they are likewise rewarded in a financial way, but far beyond anything dreamed of in this country, particularly officers of higher rank. I hope this bill will pass unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPPEL. May I make the statement that it has been my observation that there is entirely too much consideration given by the Congress to the officers of the Navy and not sufficient consideration to the enlisted men.

There are at present on the retired list of the Navy 182 officers who have been placed on the retired list, not because of disability but because they have not been selected for promotion. These able-bodied men are receiving $668,000 per annum from the taxpayers, and I maintain that if we are going to consider this bill favorably we should add an amendment to it providing adequate and proper consideration to the only known living enlisted man now on the retired list who was on the Merrimac with Captain Hobson. Until such amendment is offered I shall object.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I may state to the gentleman that that very subject matter is now being considered, and we are trying to do something fair and right by every man who accompanied Captain Hobson on this expedition. Let us cross one bridge at a time and I am satisfied the gentleman will have no complaint to make.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman, as the Chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, assure me that he will give favorable consideration and approval to a bill which I shall introduce to at least advance this enlisted man one rank on the retired list and also to grant adequate consideration to any other enlisted men who were on the Merrimac with Captain Hobson and who are not retired?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I will say to the gentleman that I will lend favorable consideration to the subject matter, but the details will have to be worked out, and I shall be pleased to cooperate with the gentleman.

Mr. HOEPPEL. If the gentleman will assure me that he will at least approve of one increase in rank on the retired list for the only known living enlisted man who was with Hobson, I shall not object.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. As I have just stated, we can handle only one bill at a time. We are trying to take care of everyone who accompanied Captain Hobson on this occasion.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman at least approve of this?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am thoroughly in accord with that principle.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, as I have the utmost confidence in the Chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, Mr. VINSON of Georgia, and am sure that he will cooperate with me to extend adequate consideration to these enlisted men, I withdraw my objection.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mrs. KAHN. May I express my approval of this belated recognition, because, along with the gentleman from New York, I feel we do very little for the men in our services who perform heroic service. For a long time I have tried to get recognition for a bill that would provide for promotion in rank to Maj. Andrew Rowan, who is famous as the man who carried the message to Garcia, a real exploit in American history. I have been unable to get it favorably considered. I am pleased, however, to see that at least someone has been more successful than I have been in according to Captain Hobson the belated recognition he deserves and hope this will serve as a precedent.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I am thoroughly in accord with the proposal to enact this bill today. I think this is the time and the hour when it should be done, but I think there has been one point in favor of Captain Hobson that has not been mentioned, and that is that almost immediately after he performed this heroic deed he was eligible for retirement, but due to the fact that on account of the exposure he had endured on this occasion his health was impaired and he had to resign, and by reason of his resignation at that time his retirement then was postponed, and he has not received a dollar from the Government since then. I am very strongly in favor of the enactment of this measure.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. I should like to call the attention of the Chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee to the fact that just a few days ago there were two pension bills considered by the Committee on Pensions, one for the widow of General Bliss, who without question was one of the foremost men of the World War, representing the President in many cases in foreign conferences; and the Honorable Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War during that period, appeared before the committee speaking in favor of this pension. There was also a pension bill introduced for the widow of Admiral Moffett. Both of these pensions were rejected by a majority of the committee on the ground that no preference should be given to dependents of officers over those of enlisted men. I merely wanted to get this in the RECORD for the purpose of ascertaining when the gentleman will give consideration to the enlisted men who were on the Merrimac with the distinguished Captain Hobson.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I may state to the gentleman from Ohio that we propose to have a committee meeting Monday and will go into the subject at that time and see what we can accomplish.

Mr. TRUAX. I hope the gentleman will give his most sincere consideration to these enlisted men. I like Captain Hobson. He is a distinguished citizen of this country, and I shall offer no objection to the bill; but it is time we began to consider the men down at the bottom instead of always considering the men at the top. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. As one of the very few left who had the privilege of serving in this House with this great, brave, and courageous gentleman, Captain Hobson, I am indeed appreciative that the Naval Affairs Committee has brought in this bill authorizing and conferring upon him the deserved honor—that of rear admiral—and I hope that no one will oppose its immediate consideration.

While Captain Hobson, with whom I have had the pleasure to serve, though I was obliged to oppose him frequently, I felt the House lost a great legislator when he left us; but it was fortunate for the House and for the country that in his place we gained a gentleman who today is recognized by all as one of the great legislators, although we lost a splendid Member in Captain Hobson, the country and the House have been benefited by the election at that time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to succeed him.

Not only was Captain Hobson a brave and courageous soldier, he was also a very capable and efficient legislator. During the 8 years I served with him I found him to be a man of unusual ability, full of vigor and determination. Naturally we could not always agree on important measures, and especially on the question of prohibition. However, that did at no time alter our, as I believe, mutual friendship and his great accomplishment was not in any way minimized in my estimation. I am pleased to say that he was just as fearless on the floor of the House as he was in Santiago Bay 30 years ago, and when I learned that he was supplanted as a Member of this House I indeed regretted it. Though that district has lost a valuable representative, yet after these years I am pleased to say that by his loss they have gained one of the most useful statesmen and diplomats in this House, as I do not know a single man who stands higher in the estimation of his colleagues or who possesses greater ability or who has achieved more for his district than our beloved, revered colleague, WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, and who today occupies the third highest and most important position in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, Captain Hobson, technically speaking, is a citizen of Alabama and one whom we are very proud of, but the pending bill seeks to honor him as a citizen of the Nation and one of its most beloved heroes. As a member of the Alabama delegation, I wish to express to the Naval Affairs Committee of the House and to its distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], our sincere appreciation for their thoughtfulness in calling up this bill for passage at this time. It has just passed the Senate without a dissenting vote, and I am sure there will be no one opposing its passage in the House.

From the act conferring the Congressional Medal of Honor on Captain Hobson it is appropriate to here quote this excerpt:

> For distinguishing himself conspicuously by extraordinary courage and intrepidity at the risk of his life on June 3, 1898, by entering the fortified harbor of Santiago, Cuba, and sinking the partially dismantled collier Merrimac in the channel under persistent fire from the enemy fleet and fortifications on shore.

[Applause.]

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, the two outstanding heroes of the War with Spain were Gen. Frederick Funston, whose home was in the district which I have the honor to represent, and Capt. Richmond Pearson Hobson, of Alabama, the former of the Army and the latter of the Navy. Both attempted seemingly impossible undertakings. Funston, by the capture of Aguinaldo, practically ended the Philippine insurrection. Captain Hobson did not completely succeed in his objective of bottling up Cervera's fleet in the harbor of Santiago by sinking the Merrimac in its entrance, but the superlative heroism with which he did his perilous work crowned him with the chaplet of immortality. The people of our country have long since enshrined both of these popular heroes in their hearts, and Funston was promoted until he became the head of the Army of the United States as ranking major general.

Today we tardily perform a duty already too long delayed in rendering this honorable recognition to the hero of the Merrimac.

Three weeks before the declaration of War with Spain, Col. Eugene F. Ware, a gallant Union soldier who wrote under the pen name of "Ironquill", wrote a poem under the title of "Kansas to Alabama" which was published widely at the time. It appeared in a St. Louis newspaper, and 4 days thereafter a reply "Alabama to Kansas" appeared in the same paper. Inquiry failed to disclose the author. The little poem of "Ironquill" is the more significant, since Kansas and Alabama furnished these two fine specimens of American manhood who became idols of the Nation.

KANSAS TO ALABAMA

Are you there, are you there, Alabam?
There seems to be a lot of trouble coming.
There's music in the air, Alabam—
The music of the fifing and the drumming.
Be my pard, be my pard,
And we'll fight them mighty hard, Alabam.

Our old war made it plain, Alabam,
We neither one was lacking spunk or mettle.
This little round with Spain, Alabam,
Will have a question I would like to settle.
Can you march day and night
And outfight me in the fight, Alabam?

If you should, if you should, Alabam,
My sunflower on your bosom I'll be pinning;
Might feel sore—but I would, Alabam—
I'd honor both the hero and the winning.
Here's to you, here's to you,
And to what we both can do, Alabam.

—Ironquill.

ALABAMA TO KANSAS

Bet your life, bet your life, Kansas boy,
The Yankee and the Johnnie are for Cuba.
Just hail me with your fife, Kansas boy;
I'll answer with my Alabama tuba.
Count me in, count me in,
I am eager to begin, Kansas boy.

Here's my hand, here's my hand, Kansas boy,
The cotton-bloom to sunflower sends greeting;
On the ocean and the land, Kansas boy,
Soon the grandees and the dons we'll be meeting,
North and South, heart to heart,
Nevermore will fight apart, Kansas boy.

Get your flag, get your flag, Kansas boy,
If you fall I will anchor it in glory;
'Tis not for me to brag, Kansas boy—
I fought it once—but that's another story.
Light is come, wrong is past,
Now I'm Union to the last, Kansas boy.

—Anonymous.

This recognition of Captain Hobson is all the more deserved by reason of the fact that his exposure and imprisonment in a Spanish prison physically incapacitated him for further service in the United States Navy.

During the years succeeding the War with Spain he represented his State with distinction in the House of Representatives, and after that service rendered valiant service to his country in the interest of temperance and against the evils of narcotics. His character reflects credit upon American manhood, and every good citizen will applaud our action in honoring him today on the thirty-sixth anniversary of the sinking of the Merrimac. [Applause.]

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Richmond Pearson Hobson, formerly a captain of the United States Navy, a rear admiral in the Navy, with the rank, pay, and allowances thereof, and upon his acceptance of such appointment and the issuance of the commission in pursuance thereof, he shall be retired by the President as from active service and be placed upon the retired list in the grade of rear admiral, as of 30 years' service, and with the pay of that grade.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] may have permission to extend his remarks on the bill at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE SPIRITUAL VALUES ATTACHED TO HOBSON AND THE "MERRIMAC"

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, it is happy indeed that on this the thirty-sixth anniversary of the sinking of the Merrimac the House should complete the legislation making the commander of that exploit a rear admiral on the retired list, thus settling right the matter that has been unfinished business for Congress for 32 years.

Mr. Speaker, it has been a general impression, due to the fact that the steering gear was shot away and the ship sank farther in than designed, that the exploit of the Merrimac failed of its purpose. On the contrary, it fulfilled its mission in a perfect way. The hearing brought out the report of Captain Concas, captain of the Spanish flagship Maria Teresa and chief of staff of Admiral Cervera, that the Merrimac compelled the Spanish ships to come out by daylight and to slow down, without formation or support, and turn prematurely very slowly, even then their propellers barely missing the hulk of the Merrimac, and pass out at reduced speed, far apart, one at a time—conditions that were perfect for their complete destruction and the quick ending of the war.

Mr. Speaker, the hearings brought out the fact that the commander of the Merrimac has been entitled to retirement for the last 32 years, on account of disabilities incurred in excessive service in the Tropics during and immediately after the Spanish War, and this legislation is but an act of justice; but I maintain that this action is a tardy but a proper recognition for extraordinary heroism, a recognition that is necessary if the Navy and our country are to harvest the full, permanent spiritual benefits of the deed.

I do not detract from the merits of the scientific and professional values so eloquently cited by Chairman VINSON when I place above them the imponderables, the rare spiritual values attaching to the sinking of the Merrimac. Who can measure the full value to the Nation, especially to the youth, when the press brought the first news, then day by day the further details of the exploit? Certainly the exaltation that thrilled me has been one of the experiences that I can never forget. Who can measure the value to the Navy of the added consciousness and affection for the Navy this brought to the American people? Who can measure the permanent value to the Navy and the Nation as Hobson and his crew of the Merrimac take their places in America's Westminster?

VOLUNTEERS FOR DEATH

Mr. Speaker, I have always been fascinated by the manifestation when hundreds upon hundreds of the officers and enlisted men volunteered for a task that looked like certain death. It seemed that the whole personnel of the fleet would have volunteered, had not the flagship signaled the fleet, "No more volunteers." The Iowa was typical in answer to the admiral's call to the fleet: "I want volunteers to sink the Merrimac." Captain Evans—Fighting Bob Evans—in a short while answered back, "My entire crew has volunteered. How many men do you want?" In his Sailor's Log, Admiral Evans recites:

The answer came back promptly, "I want one seaman from the Iowa." The question then was how to select 1 man out of 600 good ones. I was naturally anxious to send a man who would die reflecting credit on the ship. I had no idea that anyone would ever come out of the scrape alive. Two men were selected, one by me and one by the executive officer. I took a petty officer named McLean, who had served with me in the Yorktown, a first-class man in every respect; the executive took a young seaman named Murphy, a native of the State of Maine, also first class in every way. When told that I was going to sentence one of them to death in a few minutes, and being asked if they still wanted to go in the Merrimac, they both smiled and said "Yes." McLean offered Murphy $50 for his chance, which was promptly declined, and the toss of a penny decided the case in Murphy's favor. Then McLean offered him $150 for his chance, which was also promptly declined, and the poor fellow went forward with the tears streaming out of his eyes because he had lost a chance to have his head shot off! They were fine fellows to tie to, those blue-shirted chaps of mine.

Further on the admiral recites:

It was from this position that I watched the Merrimac make her last trip on the morning of June 3. During the night of the 2d I caught sight of her several times, but it was nearly daylight when I saw her distinctly as she made for the entrance of the harbor. The Spaniards were on the alert, and just as the Merrimac turned into the channel I saw the flash of a small gun, and immediately afterward the firefly sparks along the shore indicated that the infantry had opened on her with their Mausers. Then the guns on Socapa began to blaze and were followed by those on the Morro and Esmeralda batteries and the Punta Gorda Fort. Within 3 minutes the Reina Mercedes and other ships opened up, and as their heavy guns flashed the doomed ship stood out clear and distinct in the accumulating clouds of smoke. Finally the whole entrance to the harbor was a roaring blaze of powder smoke, and the Merrimac was shut out from our view. It was a dreadful sight—to my mind, what hell might look like with the lid off. I had seen all I cared to look at, and, convinced that the gallant Hobson and his equally gallant men had gone aloft forever, I retired to the pilot house, where I consoled myself with a pipe.

In his Relations of the United States and Spain, Admiral Chadwick, who had been captain of the New York and Sampson's chief of staff, writes:

The final question as to command had arisen during the afternoon. Sampson recognized the claim of the commanding officer, Commander James M. Miller, who protested against being displaced by anyone. Hobson had energetically urged his own claim as being more thoroughly conversant with the preparations than anyone else. Several young officers persistently asked to go, but Sampson finally concluded that Hobson, as having done the main work of preparation and being perfectly conversant with it, should, as a matter of fairness, be given preference. The question in his mind was wholly one of fairness. Hobson had been an officer of the line and had as such served at sea; he had left the military branch to enter the construction corps, so that the propriety of the choice from the standpoint of his ability to handle a ship could not well be gainsaid. There was much feeling over the decision, and most urgent requests were advanced by various officers; but the admiral's view, embodied in the remark, "Hobson has done the work", should be allowed full weight. Nor was there any question of a crew; practically all the men of the fleet were volunteers for the service, and the ship had to be searched and stowaways removed before she started in.

Captain Hobson, in his book, the Sinking of the Merrimac writes:

The call for volunteers had been made by signal, and names were pouring in by the hundred. It may be said broadly that the bulk of the fleet was anxious to go. The admiral had thought that perhaps it might be well to have a junior officer, and had asked for volunteers from the junior officers of the New York. The junior officers' mess responded en masse. Powell, one of my pupils at the Naval Academy, was on deck when I came on board, and begged me to take him. Eggert, another of my pupils, saw me, and pleaded to go. Men of the New York's crew pressed upon me and used all kinds of arguments to persuade me to take them. It was as though a great favor were being asked and every means were taken to have it granted.

Captain Miller had now returned to the Merrimac. When I was about to leave, the admiral sent for me and said that Captain Miller claimed it as his right as commanding officer of the vessel to go in with the Merrimac.

Further on he writes:

While on the Merrimac, Mullen, the boatswain, had asked to go. As the letting go of the bow anchor would be especially perilous, with the running out of the chain and the breaking of stops and hawsers, and no one would appreciate the danger better than the boatswain, he was accepted.

About the same time, Charette came to me and said that he had put down his name with the volunteers before leaving the New York, and he hoped I would take him for he had served with me when I was a midshipman on the Chicago.

Elsewhere he writes:

A fine-looking seaman was at the wheel. I went close and examined him and said to myself: "Unless looks deceive, he is the man for the additional work with the torpedoes." Before being spoken to, he asked if he might go with us. "What is your name and rate?" I asked. "Clausen, coxswain of the barge, sir." The rating confirmed by judgment from his looks, and I replied: "Yes; you may go. When relieved at the wheel you will be given your station and duties." The delight in the man's face could be seen in the moonlight.

And again:

Good-byes were now exchanged. The New York's men, Powell, and the pilot disembarked. Just then Mr. Crank came up and reported engines and boilers ready for the run, the boilers requiring no further firing. The launch had shoved off and was some distance away, and Mr. Crank repeated the tender of his services to go in. It would have been wrong to accept them. I hailed the launch. * * * Then it was that this gallant engineer left the Merrimac. He had not gone from her for a moment during the whole course of preparation, had not had a moment's rest in 2 days and 2 nights, and had been repairing the boilers and putting them in shape while the others were unengaged. He had expected to go in the first day and had passed through all the experience of suspense preceding action.

Elsewhere he writes:

Those were hours of interesting experience before the start. There was no diversion of the senses, and this fact and the feeling of loneliness seemed to deepen the impression of the closeness of God and nature. My business affairs had been disposed of at the beginning of the war and I had no disquieting thoughts as to the past or the future. The mind and heart accepted the reality of things with deep, keen, exquisite delight. There were singular emotions as the thoroughness of preparation and the sureness of execution became clearer and clearer, while the details and the processes were gone over again and again. Toward midnight, when there was no longer any chance of the moon failing, these emotions amounted to exultation, so much so that I could not help giving it expression. Charette had been stirring near at hand; in fact, a little while before, when someone in the darkness had made a noise, Charette expostulated in a vehement whisper: "Can't you keep quiet there? Don't you know Mr. Hobson is sleeping here?" I called out: "Charette, lad, we are going to make it tonight. There is no power under heaven can keep us out of the channel!" He seemed surprised that the outer channel was the objective, and said that he and all the other men thought we were going up into the harbor; that the admiral, Captain Chadwick, and I had been seen consulting the chart which took in the inner harbor and they all thought that we would go inside 3 miles beyond the entrance. Such was the mission for which these brave men had so ardently volunteered.

After describing the transfer to the Morro, he said:

I asked Captain Bustamante if he would be kind enough to have the surgeon directed to give careful and constant attention to the wounded men and to allow one of the crew, Charette or Montague, to come in to receive instructions as to details in taking care of their health in confinement.

Soon after the captain left, directions for the door to be left open during the daytime were issued by the authorities, and in a few minutes Charette was sent in. He had his usual cheerful look, unperturbed by the sight of the men's wretched cell and by the uncertainties of our confinement. He referred to the heavy situation we had passed through, and said, "Every man would do it again tonight, sir." Indeed, throughout the whole term of imprisonment the men showed the most remarkable spirit of cheerfulness. They never had the support of kind words and courteous visits, as I did, yet never once did they exhibit signs of anxiety or fear.

CHIVALRY IS NOT DEAD

Mr. Speaker, the courteous intercourse between the commander of the Merrimac and his Spanish captors stands out unique in the history of warfare and has a value for all the world. As you recall, the Spanish-American War was inaugurated by the blowing up of the Maine. The gruesome scenes in the long process of extricating the bodies of the dead from the wreckage of the ship had set American psychology for a war of revenge, with the slogan, "Remember the Maine." The Nation was electrified when, a few hours after the sinking of the Merrimac, a tugboat came out under a flag of truce bearing the chief of staff with a message from Admiral Cervera, commending the Merrimac men and announcing that they were safe and would be treated with every consideration. From time to time further news came out of incidents of courtesy, while the reports of the commander of the Merrimac are largely an account of the extraordinary chivalry displayed toward him and his men by Admiral Cervera, his staff, the officers of the Reina Mercedes, the officers of the Morro, the officers of the military prison in Santiago City. We all remember the happiness it gave the American Navy and the people everywhere to acclaim the gallant Admiral Cervera wherever he appeared and to entertain him and his officers at Annapolis and his men at Norfolk as guests of the Nation, a just tribute to a brave and chivalrous foe. By the time the war ended the spirit of revenge had been completely displaced by a spirit of appreciation, of admiration, and positive affection. The treaty was negotiated on a minimum basis to meet the logic of events, free from exactious reparations, indemnities, humiliations. America paid Spain $20,000,000 for territory captured and at her own expense transported the Spanish armies from Cuba back home to Spain. The peoples of the two nations have had a better understanding and a higher regard for each other ever since, and another war between them is literally unthinkable.

TODAY CHIVALRY IN EUROPE WOULD PAY

The European nations, close neighbors that should be the best of friends, might well study this American method before they again seize each other by the throat in a super-induced frenzy of anger, hate, and fear. It is useless to dismiss the idea as too idealistic for the realities of Europe since America's participation in the World War. Certain it is that European methods were in a stalemate when Americans reached the fronts. The Germans were not conquered. Their armies were still far out in enemy territory. American fighting had hardly begun. It was not the force of the physical blows, but the psychological power of the higher spirituality of the Americans that broke the German morale and quickly ended the war with the saving of hundreds of thousands of lives on both sides. In the light of history, posterity will surely proclaim that it would have been better had American ideals prevailed at Versailles instead of the dictation of an assumed conqueror. The time will come when the example first set by Cervera and Hobson at Santiago will be the attitude of all combatants, and America's method of dealing with Spain, with Cuba, and the Philippines will be adopted by all victors, until at last spiritual forces shall rule the world and the nations will war only on a common front against the foes of mankind.

HOBSON BELONGS TO THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker, the Senate may have preceded us by a few days in passing his bill, but Captain Hobson belongs to us; he is an alumnus of this House.

Having known him for a quarter of a century, I will make an appraisal on this notable occasion while he is still with us. I do not take second place even to Chairman VINSON in appreciation of Captain—soon Admiral—Hobson's scientific attainments and the powerful scientific method he always brings to bear upon problems that come to challenge him. But anyone who studies the 49 years of his eventful public service will see that the deepest, the dominant, strain in his life is spiritual. He is tenth in descent from Elder Brewster of the Mayflower, and the Puritan in him dominates the cavalier. It is because he puts God into the equation, takes conscience for his guide, and makes maximum service his goal that he has gladly attacked one after another the foes of his country and of humanity, no matter what the odds, no matter what the consequences to himself. Well do I remember when the powerful Democratic floor leader, Mr. Underwood, his colleague from Alabama, warned him on the floor of the House that his attack on the liquor traffic might seriously injure the Democratic Party. His reply was thoroughly characteristic:

Mr. Speaker, if the Democratic Party, my party, can only live by serving the liquor traffic, then in God's name let it die.

Well I remember, too, when the Brownsville bill was up with its threat of political death for Southern Members, and his friends pleaded with him just to retire to the cloakroom and not vote at all if he felt he could not vote against the bill. Instead, he asked for 3 minutes' time, made a fearless appeal for justice, and voted for the bill. In 48 hours three candidates had announced against him in his district.

I am told that the first time he became officer of the day at Annapolis he reported his classmates as well as others for infractions of the regulations. He took the consequences without complaint, 2 years in coventry, but he held to his course, and a new policy in the corps was the result.

There are traditions in the Navy that on several occasions, when he considered the right involved, he defied his senior officer at the risk of his career.

He has confided to me that his last spiritual preparations made it very easy to take in the Merrimac with efficiency. He considers the high spiritual attitude of the fleet in a just war for humanity as accounting for the thousands who volunteered and for the matchless loyalty of the crew of the Merrimac as they stayed with him during the ordeals against the strong dictates of self-preservation. He confided to me that when left alone lying on the bunk in the stateroom of Commander Acosta, of the Reina Mercedes, and he relaxed for the first time, the cry of his soul, half aloud, was one of gratitude, "O God, had life ever gone through such fire, and not a man lost."

Whether Hobson is attacking at fearful odds the army and navy of Spain at Santiago, or the liquor traffic of America, or the entrenched dope ring of the whole world, I see the same calm courage, the same fearlessness of consequences springing from great spiritual depths.

I join gladly, Mr. Speaker, with all Members of both Houses to do justice to a faithful public servant and to extend tardy recognition to a gallant naval officer for extraordinary heroism in war, but I hope I may contribute something to make this occasion even more memorable by bringing up to the light, as a national asset, a life so consistent that every father, every mother, every teacher, every minister in this country, or any country, can point to it without reservation, now and forever.

COMMUNICATIONS BY WIRE OR RADIO

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 411.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE UNDERLYING REASONS FOR THE GAG RULES—TO KILL OFF M'LEOD AND FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, the greatest existing menace to representative government in the United States is the political chicanery too frequently practiced by Members of Congress upon their own constituents. So far as the present session of Congress is concerned, the outstanding political trickery which is being practiced is found in the case of the McLeod bank pay-off bill and the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage bill.

The Speaker of this House and the majority leader, following the wishes of the President, are unalterably opposed to the consideration of these two bills in the House of Representatives. Every Member of this House, particularly the Democratic Members, knows that the Speaker and the majority leader are unalterably opposed to these bills being voted upon in this House. A petition has been signed by 145 Members to force a vote on the McLeod bill. Under the rules this is a sufficient number of signers to force a vote. One hundred and fifty-five Members have signed the petition to force a vote on the Frazier-Lemke bill. Political pressure from the Democratic leadership in the House prevailed upon some 15 Members to withdraw their signatures from this petition. Yesterday it was perfectly apparent that the necessary 145 names would be obtained for the Frazier-Lemke bill.

Under the rules of the House, after a petition has been signed by 145 Members to force a vote on a bill, the bill must lie on the Speaker's desk for 6 legislative days, and thereupon the House must vote upon it. Therefore, yesterday, it became perfectly apparent that, irrespective of White House opposition and of the opposition of the Speaker and the majority leader, there was going to be a vote on the McLeod bank pay-off bill and the Frazier-Lemke bill. Thereupon the Democratic leadership, under the pretense that it had to have gag rules in order to keep 115 Republicans from running over 315 Democrats, pushed through the gag rules of yesterday, which will prevent any vote on these bills. Of course, there is no one so silly and so gullible as to believe that this unprecedented "gag rule" passed by the House yesterday was necessary in order to protect 315 Democrats from 115 Republicans.

One of these new gag rules provides that the majority leader may move to recess the House from day to day rather than to adjourn from day to day. By the taking of a recess, the legislative trickery can be practiced of making any number of calendar days just one legislative day. For example, recessing from Saturday to Monday, from Monday to Tuesday, and from Tuesday to Wednesday, would leave the situation whereby Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday would be the legislative day of Saturday. In other words, 4 calendar days are 1 legislative day, while the following of the regular rule of adjourning from day to day each calendar day would be a legislative day. By this legislative trickery, it is now within the power of Speaker RAINEY and Majority Leader BYRNS to make it utterly impossible for 6 legislative days to expire before the adjournment of this Congress even if we are in session until December 1. In this way it will be utterly impossible for the necessary number of legislative days to be obtained in order to pass upon either the McLeod bank pay-off bill or the Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage bill.

Therefore, by this legislative sharp practice, every Member who yesterday voted for these gag rules then and there voted to make it impossible to obtain a vote in this House during this session on the McLeod bill or the Frazier-Lemke bill. There can be only one exception to this, this trickery might be carried one step further and permit a vote on these two bills on the last day or two of this session and at a time when every Member knows that there will be no chance for these bills to be considered by the Senate.

Here is the political trickery and deceit which is being practiced by Members upon their own constituents. Many of them signed the petition to force a vote on the McLeod bill and the Frazier-Lemke bill. They have written to their constituents and have told them that they have done all that they can do to bring up these bills; that they have signed the petition in order to force a vote. They will go into the campaign and point out that they signed a petition to force a vote on these two bills. By this legislative trickery they are going to depend upon their constituents being unable to understand the effect of and the real purpose of the special gag rule adopted yesterday.

So that there may be no misunderstanding and so that there may be no injustice done to any particular Member, I wish to state that every vote cast for these gag rules, which make it impossible to have a vote upon the McLeod bill and the Frazier-Lemke bill, was cast by Democratic Members. Not a single Republican vote was cast for these rules. There were five Democratic Members who voted against these gag rules. They were CROSSER and SWEENEY, of Ohio, DUNN, of Pennsylvania, HOEPPEL, of California, and CONNERY, of Massachusetts. Out of the tremendous Democratic membership in this House, they stand out in bold relief as the Members who will not vote for gag rules which will make it utterly impossible to accomplish the very purpose which they signed a petition to accomplish.

These remarks are no criticism against any Democrat who has refused to sign any petition to bring up any of these bills and who yesterday voted for the gag rule. They have practiced no deception upon their constituency. They have not held out to their constituents that they were in favor of these particular bills and then voted for a rule which makes it impossible to have a vote upon these bills. An example of this is my colleague from Kansas [Mr. AYRES]. He voted for the gag rules of yesterday, but he is practicing no deception upon his constituents because he has not signed a petition, and he has not led any of his constituents to believe that he is trying to force a vote on the McLeod or Frazier-Lemke bills. While as a matter of free and open legislative government these gag rules are an outrage, there is no deception involved upon the part of a Member who voted for the rule and who has not endeavored to lead his constituents to believe that he favors the McLeod and Frazier-Lemke bills.

The merits or demerits of these bills pale into insignificance as compared with the greater question of retaining public confidence in congressional government by Representatives playing the game absolutely square with their own constituents, their neighbors and friends.

The Democratic leadership made bold the statement that the Republicans were carrying on a filibuster to wreck the administration program. Of course, they know better. Most assuredly every Democratic Member who has ears to hear and a mind to understand what he hears knows better. They all know that the Republicans were protesting against the leadership of this House forcing this House to be in session on Memorial Day and against unwarranted arbitrary conduct on the part of the Democratic membership in denying to the minority Members their rights. They also know that the Republicans were protesting because the majority had refused to show the time-honored respect of adjourning for a day upon the death of a member. Mr. Brumm, Republican Member of Pennsylvania, died May 29. The death of a Republican Member and Memorial Day together were not enough to prevail upon the Democratic leadership for the House to stand adjourned on Memorial Day. Furthermore, what administration legislation was before the House on the days on which the Republicans were protesting? The silver bill was before the House on Memorial Day. It is purely a political bill and is branded as such by true friends of silver, such as Senators LONG, of Louisiana, and THOMAS, of Oklahoma, both Democrats. On the second day on which the Republicans were protesting, the Tarver bill, providing for the setting up of a new commission to perform the duties in relation to Federal prisons which are now performed by the Attorney General, was brought before the House.

Since when did that insignificant frivolous bill become a part of the administration emergency program? After the Tarver bill it was the program to bring up the Lozier census bill, which is to provide jobs for thousands of faithful deserving Democrats to take a wholly unnecessary census at the expense of the taxpayers of this country. Since when did that become a part of the administration emergency program?

The people of this country are not so dumb as some politicians may think. Sooner or later they are going to catch up even with the most shifty congressional politician. The American people like fair play. The ordinary American citizen will excuse and have respect for a Member of Congress who honestly disagrees with him, but he will detest the Member who tries to deceive him. In the end this legislative and political duplicity is not even going to be good politics.

This legislative and political dishonesty and duplicity cannot possibly work from the standpoint of representative government unless, indeed, Franklin did not know what he was talking about when he laid down the proposition that "honesty is the best policy."

THE CRIME-BREEDING MOVIES

Mr. CULKIN. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a measure (H.R. 9912) entitled "A bill to protect the motion-picture industry against unfair trade practices and monopoly; to provide just settlements of complaints of unfair dealings; to provide for the manufacture of wholesome motion pictures, both silent and talking, at the sources of production; to create a Federal Motion Picture Commission, and defining the powers of said Commission."

I am fully conscious that the bill introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], H.R. 6097, has the right-of-way as a matter of legislation and I intend to support it when it comes to the floor of the House. This measure I propose is perhaps, in some respects, broader in scope and in my judgment provides more surely that the productions of the moving-picture industry shall become a real cultural and educational agency in America. If my measure is enacted it will definitely prevent picturized poison being fed the young people of America, 39,000,000 of whom are in attendance at the motion pictures weekly and drink in without stint, let, or hindrance, the weird and antisocial presentments of crime and love as interpreted by decadent Hollywood.

CRIME BREEDERS

I here and now definitely charge and indict the motion-picture industry with being a crime-breeding influence among the youth of America. It could not be otherwise. Immature and innocent minds, week in and week out, drink in the hectic stories of sex appeal, white slavery, and criminalistic vice. These alleged presentments of life constantly present illicit love affairs which ever make virtue appear odious and vice attractive.

The coming generation eagerly absorb these presentations of the underworld and crime life, and morning, noon, and night see scenes that make pleasing every vice of self-stimulation or self-abasement.

Public officers in every branch of the Government service are ridiculed and particularly those charged with the enforcement of the law are presented in humiliating roles, while the underworld racketeer is glorified and uplifted.

THE INDUSTRY FAILS TO REFORM ITSELF

Since the birth of the movies in 1895 the situation has grown steadily worse, and the country is now being flooded with misrepresentations of life and its meanings. Seventy percent of the presentations are salacious, criminal, or indecent. Thirty percent of the pictures produced are in fact rational and artistic presentations of life and nature. For these productions I have nothing but praise and commendation.

A national board of review was created by the chief sinners to enforce a self-imposed censorship. The national association of the moving-picture industry has repeatedly adopted resolutions promising the production of motion pictures depicting life in artistic, uplifting fashion. The industry has repeatedly promised to court-martial its own offenders in this field, but steadily the stream of pollution which has flowed forth from Hollywood has become wider and more turbulent. Many of the agencies for reform are either subsidized or controlled by the outfits which are doing incalculable harm to the oncoming citizenship of America. It is my definite opinion that the one solution of the situation is regulation. It is my belief that the motion-picture industry is incapable of self-discipline or of court-martialing these grievous offenders against public taste and decency within its own ranks.

That interesting citizen, Will H. Hays, president of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, concedes in effect that the industry itself is incapable of self-discipline and proper censorship by reason of the fact that he himself condemns the cheap vulgarity and sex perversion presented in so many of the present-day films.

The industry has set up self-regulating bodies which under the spell of Hollywood and fat subsidies have functioned in name only. The opportunity for exploitation of the young and the immature through the box-office window is so great that no hope of self-regulation can be expected from the industry itself.

COST OF CRIME IN THE UNITED STATES

I definitely charge that the movies as presented today are direct incentive to crime. As presented today they glorify it. It should be remembered in this connection that crime is one of the biggest businesses in America and costs the country annually more than $10,000,000,000. The cost of crime in the United States each year is several times greater than the aggregate value of all the agricultural products of the United States. It is a huge organized business with a direct cost of $4,000,000,000; an overhead of four billions and a waste of five billions more. Even in these days of depression it is safe to say that crime is, from an economic and moral point of view, the greatest single problem which the United States faces.

For many years I served as district attorney and as trial judge in cases of felony. For a number of years I was judge of a children's court. Out of these experiences I naturally drew certain conclusions as to the cause of conditions in America. Out of this experience and in all sincerity I definitely charge the spoken movie as presented today with being a prime factor in the break-down of law enforcement in the United States. I definitely charge the movie with being one of the major sources of juvenile delinquency and crime. The bill which I have presented will, if enacted into law, aid materially in curing the condition which every American deplores.

The tawdry environment of the movies is an actual breeding place of crime, for there the juvenile delinquent first learns to circumvent the law. The gangman, the thug, and potential murderer are all graduates of the movie school. There he first learned how to "pull a job and bump off a guy."

THE EVIL OF BLOCK BOOKING

Many of the theater owners and managers in the country are definitely restive under the existing order. In the beginning they protested against the films that were sent them. They protest in vain, for they have to buy block booking, with the result the majority allotment to a neighborhood picture house consists of salacious films. The independent is therefore tied hand and foot. This measure will release the independent exhibitor from his chains. What have the gentlemen who constitute the board of review done to regulate the practice of block booking? Satisfied with their subsidy, they have done nothing. The children who patronize the neighborhood picture house continue to get the same poison diet that is presented in the houses in the commercial centers. This statute will break up that practice. This bill, if enacted into law, will make enforceable the producers' own code of standard of quality for films adopted in 1921. This measure does not in fact create a censorship any more than it is a breach of personal liberty to arrest a man, who, having unjustifiably shot down his neighbor, still stands with a smoking pistol in his hand. The adoption of definite standards does not mean censorship, and that, in fact, is what this statute does.

CHARACTER OF COMMISSION

My bill provides for the appointment of a commission of 5 members, 2 of whom shall be women. It definitely provides for the correction of the existing evil in this industry now ranked as the fourth in the United States. Federal intervention and control of this outfit which has gotten beyond bounds is essential in the interests of law and order and public decency. Under such a commission the spoken movie can become a sound vehicle of public entertainment. It will become a sound vehicle of public culture. Continued in its present form and under its present agencies, it will be and remain a recruiting station for crime and a breeding place for juvenile delinquency.

COMMUNICATIONS BY WIRE OR RADIO

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he has any requests for time?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I have one request.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. Speaker, I shall make a very brief statement on the rule, because I think only a brief statement is necessary. I am informed that this bill comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with a practically unanimous report.

This is a measure that has been under investigation by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for some time. It was inaugurated originally with the recommendation of the Secretary of Commerce. It has the approval of the administration, and the provisions of the bill will be fully explained by the chairman and other members of the committee.

The only purpose in waiving points of order against the bill is to avoid the requirements of the Ramseyer rule in reference to reporting changes made in the statutes.

Now, unless there is some request for time, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to use some of his time. I will say that the rule provides for 2 hours' general debate, and to consider the House amendment to the Senate bill as an original bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill dealing with the supervision and control of radio broadcasting and the necessary organization that has control of this important function.

It not only deals with radio but it consolidates under one bureau all lines of communication and takes from the Interstate Commerce Commission its jurisdiction over telephone and telegraph lines of the country, and apparently takes jurisdiction of legislation affecting communications from the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries Committee and places it all in the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

The development of radio in the United States and its importance, which is equal to that of the press, was provided for in the Constitution when our forefathers drew that important document. The people of the country were given free and open expression at all times through the press. Of course, in those days nothing like the radio and the important part it was to take in the dissemination of information was thought of. This development of radio is to my mind more important than is the control of the press of the United States. I direct the attention of the membership of the House to the growing control over all lines of communication. I mean by that the attempt at censorship which is being made and to an extent attained, not only over the press but over the radio. Radio is probably the most effective method of reaching every class of people and is more important than any other medium. Many people who do not read the newspapers listen in on radio, and form their opinions from this source. Under this tremendous development of radio during the past few years we have seen built up the use of this particular function to an extent that is almost unbelievable. We see it being used for propaganda purposes, we see it being used effectively for advertising, we see it being used in culture. Those who are in control of the agencies of publicity are particularly alive to the importance of the control of this function of radio. We have seen it used effectively by political parties, by candidates, and I do not hesitate to say that which you all know, that policies of a political party disseminated with the free use over radio can control public sentiment to an extent of political decisions. It is possible to assert personality into radio talks, oftentimes more effectively than by personal contact. Any administration in power which sees fit to use this instrument can control the sentiment of the citizenry, as the same cannot be controlled through any other medium of propaganda, not even by the press.

In a speech that I delivered on the floor of this House earlier in this session I referred to the attempt of the administration to further control the use of radio, and in that connection I read from an article from Broadcasting, which is the official organ of radio, appearing in the issue of October 1, 1933:

> Pettey made Democratic committee liaison man on official broadcasts.
> Herbert L. Pettey, secretary of the Radio Commission, has been designated by Postmaster General James A. Farley, who is chairman of the Democratic National Committee, as liaison man for the committee on all matters relating to broadcast speeches under the committee's auspices. Mr. Farley on September 8 wrote letters to that effect to Cabinet officials and all ranking Government bureau chiefs and to the presidents of the two national networks.
> Mr. Farley explained that it has come to attention of the committee that many individuals have been contacting the networks and stations with requests for time, representing themselves as spokesmen for the Democratic National Committee on radio matters. "The only person authorized to represent the Democratic National Committee on matters of this kind", Mr. Farley's letters stated, "is Mr. Herbert L. Pettey, who you will recall as the director of radio during the past campaign."
> Persons wishing radio time are asked to clear their requests through Richard F. Roper, executive secretary of the committee, who then takes up the requests with Mr. Pettey, the direct radio contact. The plan applies only to radio time requests represented as being endorsed by the Democratic committee.

That shows what the Democratic Party is doing in regard to the control of broadcasting for political purposes over these systems. When the change of administration took place and the Democrats came into office, they found that the control of radio was very much in the hands of and very much to the advantage of the outgoing administration; that it had been used to a great extent by the previous administration and dominated to a great extent by it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. In just a moment. I do not want to yield at this time.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is important at this point.

Mr. McFADDEN. The question of the political control of the use of radio is an important thing to the American people, and I call attention to the fact that the incoming administration felt they had to deal with this subject, else it might be controlled to their detriment. So there was immediate action as to a change in personnel of the Commission. Key men were arranged for. Hanley and Pretty and others were put in, and there was immediately appointed this special committee, of which the Secretary of Commerce was the head, who made this study that has been the basis of this particular legislation which is before you, and this is particularly an administration measure. It is the President's bill. He has seen to it that no changes are made. It was drawn in the administrative departments and was presented to the committees of the Senate and the House and has had very little consideration by either one of those committees. It is true there were hearings held and a lot of protests were entered, but no attention was given to amendments. The bill was kept just as the President wanted it.

This bill we find here today strikes out everything after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and substitutes the House bill. It is proposed here that this bill shall go through this House without any amendment or any proper consideration of it by the House. It is a long bill. The Senate bill is 175 pages long. There is not going to be an opportunity for the Members of the House to do any more, practically, than to listen to the reading of this bill, and I point out that this is another one of those administration measures dealing with an important function which affects all of the people of the United States, and which is being put through in the same manner that all of this other legislation has been proposed and passed by this House. Just as the President wishes, this House is again signing on the dotted line without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. Prior to the introduction of this bill, I introduced a bill dealing with the question of the discrimination or censorship with regard to broadcasting. Extensive hearings were held on my bill before the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries Committee during this session, where there was evidence presented that the two leading broadcasting systems of this country, the National Broadcasting Co. and the Columbia, were practically working in unison so far as the question of consorship was concerned. This committee was told by the president of the National Broadcasting Co., Mr. Aylesworth, that they had arbitrarily set up a board of censorship and it was also disclosed that the Columbia system went along on censorship with them. And these two systems control over 80 percent of the facilities of broadcasting in the United States, and if any independent stations permit anything to be broadcast that either of these two systems object to, the independent station is immediately in hot water and placed in fear of losing its station license to broadcast. The National Broadcasting Co. and Columbia seem to dominate the Commission. The independents are scared to death at the present time.

Mr. Aylesworth said specifically in regard to that, that that was an arbitrary matter; that they felt they had a right to determine who should broadcast. Those two systems, the Columbia and the National Broadcasting, are attempting to control broadcasting in the United States. He said it is radio's contribution. The control of the Columbia Broadcasting System is now in the hands of one family, and Mr. William P. Paley and his family completely control and dominate this important system of broadcasting. The N.B.C. is controlled by General Electric, Westinghouse, American Telephone & Telegraph, and a few of these other corporations and individuals, but they have a monopoly. The interests which have been placed in control of the question of censorship, Mr. Aylesworth told the committee, was vested in a board which they had chosen, which they said was representative of the various interests of the country, but I am frank to say that an analysis of that board of censorship indicates that it might just as well be one man. They are of one mind; they stand for the things that are international—League of Nations, World Court, and so forth.

Mr. KURTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. KURTZ. Who is William P. Paley?

Mr. McFADDEN. He is the owner of the Columbia Broadcasting Co.

Mr. KURTZ. What other business is he engaged in?

Mr. McFADDEN. I cannot say whether he has any other business or not. I do not know. But it is important on this question of the use to which radio is put to know for a fact that there is censorship, what kind of censorship it is, and how and where it came from. It would be well to keep in mind section 29 of the present Radio Act, and in doing this, see whether the Commission in permitting this kind of censorship to continue are within this law, or are just letting these two systems do as they please.

I want to point out how the control of this system is being used for propaganda purposes. Take, for instance, the question of the discussion over the radio of religious subjects.

This board which passes on the right of people to speak on any religious subject over the radio is composed of a committee designated under the direction of Mr. Aylesworth, head of the National Broadcasting Co. He stated to the committee that they had picked a Catholic, a Jew, and a Protestant as a board. As far as that committee is concerned in its action, they are largely under the direction of the Federated Council of Churches of Christ in America, an institution which was established and which is being carried on largely at the expense of the Carnegie Foundation, under the direction of the Twentieth Century Fund, which is an international propaganda outfit which has for its main purpose, under the leadership of the Carnegie Foundation, of which Nicholas Murray Butler is president, the destruction of our form of government in the United States.

The purposes of the Carnegie Foundation and the purpose they are serving are to do away with our form of government and turn this country over as a colony to Great Britain—a big brother of Canada—and millions of dollars of the funds of these foundations are being used to disseminate this idea camouflaged under various agencies, many of which are promoting our adherence to the World Court, the United States joining the League of Nations, further control of our finances by the Bank for International Settlements, and further cooperation by the labor groups in the United States with the International Labor Union with headquarters at Geneva. We must recognize the fact that the International Labor organization is affiliated with the League of Nations, that the World Court is the legal end of the League of Nations, that the Bank for International Settlements at Basle, Switzerland, is the financial part of the League of Nations, and that the Carnegie Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, and these other large foundations, whose policy is largely dominated by Nicholas Murray Butler and the trustees of the Twentieth Century Fund, are tied in with the Foreign Policy Association, the Foreign Affairs Committee, and their many affiliations, and through these channels an internationalization of all lines of communication is in contemplation.

This consolidation of lines of communication, as provided for in this bill, has a British origin; and the use of these various lines of communication is made readily available to the interests of this particular group to put across their propaganda at any and all times.

Now, as to this board of censorship which is established and so largely dominated by the group who are running the Federated Council of Churches of Christ in America, headed by S. Parkes Cadman, the British propagandist who is in our midst for the very purpose of helping to carry out the internationalization of the United States and bring it under the domination and control of the British Empire, there is no reason whatsoever why the National Broadcasting Co. should permit this council to decide for Protestant religions of the United States what religious subjects should be broadcast. The Federated Council of Churches of Christ in America is a self-instituted organization and does not speak for the Protestant churches in the United States. It is an attempt to amalgamate the Protestant, Jewish, and Catholic religions and is a part of the whole international scheme to internationalize the United States and take away our independence, and the Federal Radio Commission are acquiescing in permitting this board of censorship to continue in what I believe to be a violation of section 29 of the radio law.

I know that there is provided in this bill that a study of this entire situation shall be made. I mentioned the religious end of it because that is only one phase. There are several other phases to which the use of the radio is being put that is not to the best interest of the American people. So I say that the manner in which these important matters are handled is of vital interest to every man, woman, and child in the United States, particularly those who believe in constitutional government and in the protection of that form of government, because I say to you that there is being carried out to an almost unbelievable extent through the use of radio a very insidious plan of propagandizing the United States on these particular subjects. There is no fair distribution of time in opposition to the various doctrines that are disseminated throughout the country today, and much of this kind of stuff is broadcast with no opportunity to answer. The air is full of it.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including a copy of the resolution which I presented to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, dealing with the subject of censorship.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Reserving the right to object, I will object unless the gentleman will permit a question.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. My question is this: Approximately 3 weeks ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania delivered an address over the radio——

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield for a question only.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I am going to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman delivered an address. He found no difficulty, evidently, in delivering the address over the radio, which had for its purpose an attack upon a defenseless and innocent people on account of their religion. Did the gentleman have any difficulty in voicing his mean statements?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman in reply, regardless of the motive, that I was invited to deliver that address by a broadcasting company, and I did deliver the address to which the gentleman refers. It was not, however, an attack upon the Jews on account of their religion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

No person, persons, company, association, or corporation owning and operating a radio broadcasting station, and receiving and broadcasting radio programs for hire, shall discriminate in the use of such station in favor of a program of speech sponsored by any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office, and/or by any religious, charitable, or educational company, corporation, association, or society, or any other like association or society, and against or to the exclusion of another person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office, or of another religious, charitable, or educational company, corporation, association, or society chartered or licensed under the laws of the United States, because and for the reason that such person, religious, charitable, or educational company, corporation, association, or society holds and promulgates and advocates views contrary to those expressed in programs that have been broadcast. The owner, lessee, or operator of any broadcasting station contracting for or accepting and broadcasting radio programs for one legally qualified candidate for a public office, and for one class of religious, charitable, or educational company, corporation, association, or society, and refusing to contract for or to accept and broadcast for hire radio programs of speech offered for broadcast by another legally qualified candidate for a public office, or by any other religious, charitable, or educational company, corporation, association, or society within the provisions of this section, because or for the reason that such legally qualified candidate, or such religious, charitable, or educational company, corporation, association, or society holds or promulgates a contrary or different view from that which is expressed by the person or parties broadcasting programs, shall be deemed guilty of an unlawful discrimination. All persons, companies, corporations, or associations owning and operating a radio station who shall be guilty of a misdemeanor shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and in addition thereto may be required to forfeit the license for operating such broadcasting station.

No person, persons, company, association, society, or corporation shall by threats, or by coercion, or by misrepresentation, or any other like manner interfere with or prevent, or attempt to interfere with or prevent, the broadcasting of any radio program by any owner, lessee, or operator of any radio broadcasting station; or interfere with or attempt to interfere with, or to prevent any owner, lessee, or operator of any radio broadcasting station from entering into a contract with another person, persons, company, association, society, or corporation, to accept, receive, and broadcast programs of speech and music by radio. No person, persons, company, association, society, or corporation shall induce or attempt to induce any person, persons, company, association, society, or corporation to withdraw business or financial support or social intercourse from any radio broadcasting station, or the owner, lessee, or operator of any radio broadcasting station in the use and operation of such radio station or in the broadcasting of any and all programs offered to be broadcast, or which may be broadcast at any such station. Any person, persons, association, society, or corporation violating this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or in the case of an individual or the responsible officials of an association or corporation, by imprisonment for a term of not less than 60 days nor more than 2 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. McFADDEN. I should like to have this resolution made a part of this bill and would offer it as an amendment, but I know that such an amendment to this bill would not have any chance of being adopted, as no amendments are going to be accepted by the men having this bill in charge; and on this account I am not going to waste the effort by trying to have the bill accepted. I shall hope that the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries Committee will report favorably upon my bill, H.R. 7986, which embodies this provision, and thus not ignore the wishes of over two and a half million people who have petitioned the Congress to pass this bill dealing with the subject of proper control of broadcasting and censorship.

Mr. CULKIN. Under the present law these licenses for broadcasting continue from year to year if they are extended. Is that not true?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. That is, they may be revoked at the end of a year?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. What is the advantage of this law over the present statute? What is the necessity for it?

Mr. McFADDEN. I suppose it is in order to keep a more complete control over broadcasting. I might say in that connection that the board having jurisdiction over this is exercising a control over the small stations, which are the independent stations, which is a subject which this committee, if it is appointed to make the study, must give very careful consideration to, because I find that the action of the Commission in dealing with the small stations is to drive them out of business, which seems to be the plan of the two big chains. Broadcasting in the United States is rapidly becoming a monopoly in the hands of those two systems. They have now under contract 80 percent of all the available stations and their time. The Columbia Broadcasting System is very responsive to suggestions from the other important system, the National Broadcasting Co. These two outfits dominate the chain systems. It is a situation that looks to me—and anyone who will study it must believe likewise, for he cannot come to any other conclusion—that the purpose is to have a centralized system completely under the control of one dominating influence—and that the National Broadcasting Co., which is owned, operated, and controlled by the Radio Corporation of America. It would seem from the method and manner in which the Commission has been operating, as though it were encouraging doing away with the small stations, just in accordance with the aim of the National Broadcasting Co.

I might say in that connection as an illustration that a station located in western Pennsylvania has recently been going through a critical period with the Commission, in which they are finding all kinds of fault with the operations, which is similar to that which is taking place with all of the small stations throughout the country, making it utterly impossible for those stations to comply with the regulations of the Commission. The Commission in their dealings with the small independent stations, particularly those stations who are not now under contract with N.B.C. or Columbia, are carrying on a policy of absolute intimidation. They do not dare say that their souls are their own, lest the license be taken away from them. If you do not believe this statement, read the hearings on my bill held before the Merchant Marine and Radio Committee just recently.

These facilities are then transferred to other companies. It is a situation which confronts the independent broadcaster in the United States today.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. In this connection it would be interesting for the Membership to know that which has occurred with regard to this station at ashington, Pa., operated by Mr. Spriggs, an American citizen, who has invested a large amount of money in the running of a small 100-watt station. They have practically made it impossible for him to continue to operate; and when you go through all of the detail in connection with this one situation, as I have, you cannot fail but to see that the strong hand of influence is drying up the independent broadcasting stations in the United States and the whole thing is tending toward centralization of control in these two big companies, if not one company.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman feel that it is fair to try the merits of any particular station on the floor without knowing all the facts? The gentleman has brought a very grave charge against the Federal Radio Commission, one in which I absolutely cannot concur.

Mr. McFADDEN. Replying to the gentleman, I shall be very glad to include in these remarks supporting data.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include at this point statements pertaining to this matter which I am sure will give the House more satisfactorily the information I am attempting to outline briefly in these few minutes. This matter is in regard to the station at Washington, Pa.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, are these the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. McFADDEN. They are excerpts from statements pertaining to this particular station.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the gentleman from Illinois objects. I shall, however, be very glad to give the specific information to any Member of this House who desires to have it, because it shows not only an involvement of the Commission but it shows clearly the desire of these two big broadcasting companies to drive out of existence these small corporations. It involves also political influence to an extent that is unbelievable, of men who are influential in Pennsylvania, in the National Capital, the Department of Justice, and the Radio Commission.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman has probably studied this bill. As I read the bill it simply coordinates the present disjointed action of the various parties supposed to supervise. Is there any statement of policy in this bill based upon the report of the Federal Trade Commission relating to the communications system being monopolies?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not think there is. There should be a definite policy laid down, one fair to all the people.

Mr. GIFFORD. There is nothing in this bill anywhere on the question of the policy to be pursued relating to educational or communication features laid down for the guidance of this particular new commission?

Mr. McFADDEN. I think it avoids that particular question.

Mr. GIFFORD. Does not the gentleman think, in view of the long report of the Federal Trade Commission relating to this being a very great monopoly, that some attention should have been given to the matter, that some policy should have been stated in the bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do.

FOR THE RELIEF OF FRANK J. BOUDINOT (H.R. 6275)

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the original bill was prepared and introduced upon the request of the Cherokee Indians themselves. They recognize that Frank J. Boudinot has rendered long, continuous, and effective service in their behalf, and are anxious that he be adequately compensated.

The bill has been rewritten and in its present form recites the fact that it is presented at the request of the Cherokee Indians, and provides that upon final determination by the Court of Claims of any suit or suits pending against the United States brought under the several jurisdictional acts approved March 19, 1924, or as subsequently amended, there shall be considered by the Court of Claims the question of the services and expenses of Frank J. Boudinot, a member of the Cherokee Tribe of Indians, for those services and expenses incurred prior to the enactment of the jurisdictional act above referred to.

The Cherokee Nation was in effect destroyed by the act of June 28, 1898, commonly known as the "Curtis bill." Prior to that time it was a self-governing Indian nation. This act prevented the Cherokees from legislating further without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, destroyed its judicial system, and prevented it from appropriating or expending its own money in any further effort to continue its national existence.

Later, appreciating that it was useless to further resist the purposes of the Government, the Cherokees themselves, by a vote on August 7, 1902, ratified an act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, commonly known and referred to as the Cherokee Agreement. This agreement embodied many of the features of the act of June 28, 1898, and the disintegration of the Cherokee Nation, which had started with the enactment of the Curtis bill, continued. Rolls had to be made, the lands allotted, and many details had to be administered.

The Cherokees insisted upon a final settlement of the numerous claims which they had against the Government, and they met on many occasions and at various places, prepared and sent letters to the Interior Department, and sent resolutions to Congress, and, in fact, took every step necessary to keep alive the many claims which they were desirous of having presented and adjudicated against the Government.

It must be remembered that this was before statehood had been granted to Oklahoma. Therefore, Oklahoma had no Representative either in the Senate or House and, insofar as these particular claims were concerned, the views of the Cherokee Indians were presented to the Department and to the committees of Congress through organizations of their own, and all meetings on these matters, from time to time, and year to year, wherever held, were attended by Frank J. Boudinot, who assisted in the preparation of letters and resolutions setting forth the views and will of the Cherokee Indians.

Frank J. Boudinot, in addition to having a literary education, is a graduate of the law department of Ann Arbor University, and has been admitted to practice law in all the tribal courts in the Cherokee Nation, Oklahoma State and Federal courts, and the Court of Claims and Supreme Court of the United States. His people were distinguished representatives of the Cherokees before their removal from Georgia, and throughout the entire history of the Cherokee Tribe the name of Boudinot, with that of Watie and Ridge—all of the same family—may be found.

From 1898 Frank J. Boudinot, to my personal knowledge, continued to assist in keeping alive the claims insisted upon by the Cherokees, and but for his efforts and of those associated with him I feel safe in asserting that no jurisdictional act would finally have been passed.

When Congress admitted Oklahoma to statehood on November 16, 1907, Boudinot, with renewed energy, continued his efforts to secure a forum where the claims, later filed in the Court of Claims, might be filed. For the past 25 or 30 years, to all intents and purposes, he has lived in Washington, and has spent all his personal means in a continuous effort to provide a forum where these claims might be adjudicated.

I was elected to Congress in the November 1914 election. Mr. Boudinot immediately, through me, continued his efforts in the form of bills to secure the right of the Cherokees to go into the Court on Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, to adjudicate their claims. He discussed the matter with me from year to year. He appeared before the departments, before the committees of Congress year after year, in an effort to secure the Cherokees the right to present their claims in court. With his cooperation I introduced and secured the enactment of the first jurisdictional bill of March 19, 1924.

This was the result of 28 years of almost continuous effort of a man who has tenaciously insisted that the Cherokee Indians should have their day in court. He has impoverished himself and the members of his family and has made great financial sacrifices for a principle. Delays have been encountered in the trial of the cases in that reports have not been forthcoming as quickly as was anticipated, and as a result the suits that were filed under the original jurisdictional act of March 19, 1924, have not as yet been brought to trial.

Mr. Boudinot has cooperated in securing the enactment of much amendatory legislation, including the act of May 19, 1926, which authorized any number of suits to be brought under the original jurisdictional act of March 19, 1924, and the joint resolution of February 19, 1929, which extended the time within which these suits might be brought under the original jurisdictional act, until June 30, 1930.

Largely as a result of his efforts nine suits have been brought on behalf of the Cherokees, involving various amounts, including accountings and interest.

Subsequently I assisted in the preparation and enactment of the act of April 25, 1932, which authorized either new suits, or permitted the eastern and western Cherokee Indians to be made parties to the suits which had previously been filed in behalf of the Cherokees, in order to make sure that all the rights of the Cherokees might be tried on their merits.

In the meantime the Cherokee Indians, appreciating that Frank J. Boudinot had spent a lifetime and all his personal means in making the fight for them, met and passed a resolution to grant him additional compensation of not to exceed 5 percent for his services and expenses on behalf of the Cherokees prior to the enactment of the original jurisdictional bill.

In this connection I think I am justified in saying that I believe that former Senator Robert L. Owen, of Oklahoma, himself a Cherokee, and myself, also a member of the tribe, know more of the services of Frank J. Boudinot on behalf of the Cherokees than any other persons.

Former Senator Owen, prior to his election to the Senate, was active in Cherokee affairs, later was United States Indian agent, and finally conducted some litigation for the Cherokees, and upon the advent of statehood in Oklahoma, was elected one of the two United States Senators from that State and served the State in the Senate for 18 years. During all this time, both before and after he entered the Senate, he knew Frank J. Boudinot personally, knew of his services to the Cherokees, and of the sacrifices he made in their behalf.

Personally I have known Mr. Boudinot all his life. He formerly lived in my home town of Tahlequah, Okla., and I have known in detail of his services in behalf of the Cherokee Indians. Both Senator Owen and I appeared before the Bureau of Indian Affairs in behalf of this legislation in behalf of Frank J. Boudinot, and Senator Owen made an earnest plea for favorable consideration of the bill. I supplemented his efforts. Later when the bill was introduced in Congress and was pending before the House and Senate Indian Committees, Senator Owen appeared before the Senate Indian Committee and urged favorable action on the rewritten bill. I appeared before both committees and before a subcommittee of the House Indian Committee, and gave the bill my unqualified approval.

The bill, as rewritten, provides that in the event any judgment or judgments should be rendered in favor of the Cherokees, the Court of Claims is directed to include in its decree allowances to Frank J. Boudinot for a reasonable percentage, not to exceed 5 percent, of such recovery.

I have never introduced a private bill in Congress which I think had more merit in it than this bill in behalf of Boudinot. Here is a man who has spent all his private means, has made great personal sacrifices, and impoverished himself and his family, tenaciously clinging to the hope that these claims on behalf of the Cherokees would be finally adjudicated. He has finally reached the end of the trail. His financial condition impedes his further progress. He has reached the age when his physical condition is weakened. No man within my knowledge or experience has so completely given his entire life to the service of an Indian tribe or group of people.

The Cherokee tribe, of which Boudinot is a member, appreciate his services and passed resolutions, which are included in the hearings, urging favorable action on this bill. A representative of the tribe, when these hearings were in progress, came from Oklahoma to Washington to renew the representations of the Cherokees and to urge favorable action on this bill.

I have had no hesitancy in earnestly pressing before the committees of the House and Senate, and on the floor of the House itself, favorable action upon this bill. If this bill becomes a law, and if and when a judgment is rendered in behalf of the Cherokees in any of the pending suits, the question of the allowance of a reasonable fee for compensation and money for expenses of Frank J. Boudinot comes before the Court of Claims for consideration, I feel safe in asserting that the court, after considering the length of time and lifetime record of Boudinot in behalf of the Cherokees, will not hesitate to grant him fair and reasonable compensation, which will meet with the approval of those familiar with every detail of his efforts in behalf of the Cherokee Indians.

COMMUNICATIONS BY WIRE AND RADIO

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HOIDALE]. Then I shall move the previous question on the resolution.

DROUGHT SITUATION IN MIDDLE WEST

Mr. HOIDALE. Mr. Speaker, those of us who live in the drought-stricken areas of the Middle West, have had our attention nailed so intently to the suffering and distress of our people that we have almost lost sight of anything and everything else.

We have anxiously been watching the weather map upon the wall from day to day without seeing a sign of relief. Days have gone by, weeks have gone by, months have gone by, and no rain. In many sections of the West the soil has blown off the fields, filling up depressions, ditches, and piling up along fences like snow drifts.

Cattle, and other farm animals, are dying from starvation, and in some places from lack of sufficient water. A letter received this morning says that the writer has talked with a farmer from Clarkfield, Minn., who says that in that part of western Minnesota they are shooting cattle by the hundreds to keep them from starving to death.

I am just in receipt of two telegrams, which I will read:

No rain; pastures dead; crops destroyed; cattle dying from starvation; farmers broke, with no credit; local system of relief broken down; situation is of national concern; we look to the Federal Government for aid in our emergency; urge immediate generous additional appropriation to avert wholesale loss of livestock; every additional day without aid disastrous.

ART SPENCER,
Chairman Mass Meeting Farmers of Bigstone and Traverse Counties.

Drought conditions in Sibley County most serious ever known; many instances of live stock dying because feed unobtainable at any price; absolutely imperative that Government waive restrictions in corn-hog rental contracts, permitting planting of forage crops not only on uncontracted acres, but also on contracted areas without forfeiture of rental payment; we are in the toughest spot known since the county was settled, and ask that you contact Agricultural Adjustment Administration immediately and spare no effort in impressing upon them the necessity for quick action.

H. H. BONNIWELL, Jr.

These are only samples of hundreds of telegrams and letters that come in describing the situation and praying for help.

A great deal has been done by the Government, but this catastrophe has developed into such proportions that it has been impossible to adequately supply the demand for relief.

A week or two ago some of the Members of Congress, including myself, from nine States, got together for the purpose of devising ways and means of handling this situation. In the 2 weeks that have passed since we had our first meeting more than 12 additional States have been added to those that are in need of relief. The situation is as yet little understood and the consequences will reach far into the future.

Instead of working themselves out of debt, our farmers will this year, because of crop failure, be saddled with an increasing load of obligations. Taxes that cannot be paid because there is no income from the farm will add to the increasing debt burden.

Immediate relief must, of course, be provided for those in distress, but we must bear in mind that the relief that is furnished at this time to take care of hungry people and starving cattle is not going to be an adequate remedy. We must have in mind and we must act to provide help for the farmer upon a permanent basis. If this is not done, agriculture will crumble in financial ruins. I am not going to attempt this morning to set out in detail the things that should be done and must be done to help agriculture, but I do want to impress upon this Congress and upon the country the seriousness of the situation and the necessity for reaching a helping hand to our rural communities and to those who live upon the farms.

And another thing that we must immediately set about to accomplish is to provide for water conservation in order to avoid calamities of this kind in the future. It is well to take care of the situation today, but we must also have our eyes upon the future.

This drought has been creeping in upon us for many years. For years we have suffered from a decreasing supply of surface water with the result that our lakes and rivers have gone dry and our subsurface water level has been lowered to a danger point.

Let me give you some of the facts that indicate what is facing us.

When I came to western Minnesota as a boy I helped dig many a well when an abundance of water was found at a depth ranging from 14 to 25 feet. There was a good supply of moisture in the subsoil. This subsoil mixture, so necessary to production, and the subsurface water level was maintained by surface waters in the sloughs and low places which soaked into the ground and furnished a subsoil moisture that helped materially to carry crops through in dry seasons. This surface water level has now been lowered to such an extent that it is necessary to go down from 80 to over 200 feet in order to get a supply of well water. The change has been tremendous and disastrous.

Back in the eighties our farm was normally one-third under water. Our hay was cut by rimming around the low places. Now the boys play golf on the lowest part of what was then our farm.

At this very time our State is suffering terribly from the result of last summer's drought. The price of grain or other products of the farm can do the farmer no good if he cannot raise enough on his land to keep his stock from dying.

As chairman of a committee appointed to investigate what may be done to conserve water, I have just submitted a report to the full committee as follows:

What has transpired since this committee was appointed 2 weeks ago has emphasized the need for speedy and far-sighted action in efforts that must be made to increase precipitation and conserve the waters from seasonal rains and snows.

Statistics prove that the last 8 or 9 years have given to the States of the Middle West a reduced and steadily declining rainfall. Normal rainfall in the State of Minnesota, for instance, is about 26 inches. During the last 5 years our average has been slightly over 21 inches. The rainfall this year has been less than 40 percent of normal. Substantially the same conditions have prevailed in the other States of the drought-stricken section.

No problem facing our Nation today is of greater moment than this question of water. The most fertile and promising area in the great agricultural West is being converted into a semiarid region. A continuation of these conditions not only means financial and economic ruin to the Middle West, but its direful effect will be felt in the Nation at large in more ways than one. It is a threat that hangs like a dark cloud over the land.

We have had dry seasons before, but never one of such devastating severity as this.

What is the cause and what can be done about it?

No doubt we have ourselves to blame in the first instance in that we entered upon very unwise drainage operations that resulted in the dumping of our rain and snow waters into the ocean a few hours after the earth had been blessed by this moisture. When we did that we were interfering with the laws of nature. Today we view the wreckage and suffer the consequences.

It is conceded that precipitation comes from air moisture created by evaporation from surface waters. It is a compensating process continuing in an endless cycle. A desert that yields up no moisture gets nothing from above.

Not only have the surface waters of earlier days disappeared from our lakes and rivers but the moisture in our subsoil is gone and we get no evaporation from below. The subsurface water level which in former years in Minnesota stood at less than 20 feet has now fallen to 100 feet, and in many places it is necessary to go below that for water.

What is the remedy?

1. Build dams in rivers and at the outlets of lakes throwing the waters back into lakes and low places that can serve no better purpose.

2. Build water reservoirs in places that make that kind of water storage feasible.

3. Close, temporarily at least, drainage ditches and tiling.

It is understood, of course, that fair compensation must be made to landowners whose lands are appropriated for the common good.

The planting of trees and the conservation of forests must be taken into account.

This is a brief statement of the conditions that now confront us.

We need action and we need it quickly. There is no greater or better field for the expenditure of the P.W.A. money than is afforded by a sensible plan to divert and conserve waters now going to waste.

A delay of another year may be very costly. The West cannot stand another crop failure. The consequences would be too dreadful to contemplate.

We had a conference this week with Colonel Waite for the purpose of ascertaining what has been done in the way of surveys and plans along the lines here suggested. We found that some work has been done and that a report on the situation will probably be forthcoming in July. We gave to Colonel Waite the assurance that we would take an active part in bringing about quick action and that we would insist that it is imperative that work on a big scale get well under way this summer in order that we may retain such spring water as may fall next spring.

We are impressed with the thought that it is necessary to take immediate steps to arouse the public to a realization of the fact that we are facing a major calamity that must be met promptly and courageously.

A rainfall tomorrow or the next day will afford a measure of temporary relief, but we will be face to face with a calamity until we restore nature to the position which we so ruthlesaly destroyed some years ago in our eagerness to put every acre into production.

This program would cost some money, but the cost will be small compared with the money that we are now spending and will continue to spend if this situation is not remedied.

We call upon municipalities and farm organizations to join in this effort to bring water back to lands that are now parched and sterile because of lack of moisture.

This situation is serious enough so that this Congress should immediately appoint a committee to take charge of and direct efforts in connection with this drought situation. The agencies of the Government now established for different purposes seem to be so taken up and engrossed in other matters that they are not prepared to take charge of this situation. This is something that will require all the time and all the attention of one man or a body of men, and it is my opinion that arrangements should be made immediately to have this matter of water conservation given immediate and constant attention until the problem is solved.

I am calling your attention to this now in order to plead with you for your sympathy and support in such efforts as will be put forth to alleviate the most devastating drought condition from which this country has suffered in its history.

We must immediately provide enough money to furnish complete relief, but this is only patchwork. We must get down to the big question of taking care of the future.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOIDALE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman does not have to go as far west as his own State. The State of Ohio, my State, is literally burned up.

Mr. MOIDALE I know it, and so are Indiana, California, and other States.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOIDALE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I should like to have the gentleman explain to this Congress how we are going to legislate effectively to grant relief to these people inasmuch as the proposed legislation coming to this floor Monday and all of next week comes in under a gag?

Mr. HOIDALE. The people who are in control of the gag may have some sympathy for the people of the United States, and I trust they will have.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOIDALE. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman give us for the benefit of the RECORD the number of States over which this drought extends?

Mr. HOIDALE. I understand some 22 or 23 at the present time.

Mr. HOIDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a report of mine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

REGULATION OF COMMUNICATIONS BY WIRE OR RADIO

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 3285) to provide for the regulation of interstate and foreign communications by wire or radio, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3285, with Mr. DISNEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the rule provides an hour to each side for general debate. I shall certainly take a very small part of that time because I do not deem it necessary to take up very much time on this matter.

With reference specifically to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], I may say that they do not apply in anywise to this bill, for the reason that in the House draft of the bill we do not in anywise amend or change the Radio Act. I think it is also a fair statement to make that the bill as a whole does not change existing law, not only with reference to radio but with reference to telegraph, telephone, and cable, except in the transfer of the jurisdiction and such minor amendments as to make that transfer effective.

I think I am also justified in saying that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman says the existing law is substantially reenacted. Will the gentleman tell the House specifically whether section 29 is reenacted? Section 29 relates to the right of free speech by means of radio and communication and provides that no obscene language may be used.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. I think a reading of title III in the bill as reported shows that this is not affected in any way, because the gentleman's committee simply transferred the powers of the Federal Radio Commission to this new Communications Commission and does not undertake in any respect to change or to modify the existing radio law.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the statement that I made, and I felt sure I was correct. I am certainly glad to have the assurance of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], who knows more about radio legislation than any member of our committee.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say briefly that section 29 is of first importance and should be continued in any subsequent legislation.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is what we intended to do.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. I may say to the gentleman that as Chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries I believe this is the best that could be effected at this time, dealing with such a delicate article as the radio.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman from Virginia that we have brought all of the elements of communication under one head. We did not set out to amend the law with reference to radio especially, a matter about which our committee knows little, because it has not handled that legislation, and we thought we were doing about as much as we might be expected to do at this time.

I shall put in the RECORD with my remarks a further explanation of some of the provisions of the bill as an extension of my remarks.

Section 1 states the purpose of the act and provides for the creation of the Federal Communications Commission.

Section 2 (a) states the application of the act to interstate and foreign communication by wire or radio and transmission of energy by radio. The Canal Zone is excepted, because all radio activities in that area are under military and naval authorities. The Philippine Islands are excepted because their distance from the United States makes it inadvisable for a commission in the United States to try to regulate interference in the Philippines. The present laws governing communications do not apply to either the Canal Zone or the Philippines.

Section 2 (b) exempts from most of the provisions of the act small independent telephone companies whose only interstate business is through physical connection with a nonaffiliated company. The sections to which such independent companies are subjected are those providing for the regulation of rates and prohibiting unjust discrimination in interstate and foreign service.

Section 3 contains definitions taken largely from existing law and international conventions.

Section 4 provides for a bipartisan seven-man commission serving 7-year terms. In paragraph (f) the commission is authorized to appoint certain general officers without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923. By paragraph (k) the commission is directed to make a special report not later than February 1, 1935, recommending such amendments to the act as it deems desirable in the public interest.

Section 5, authorizing the commission to organize itself into not more than three divisions, follows section 17 of the Interstate Commerce Act. The full commission has the right to review decisions of a division, but such review lies within the discretion of the commission and is not mandatory.

TITLE II. COMMON CARRIERS

Section 201 (a) is based upon section 1 (4) of the Interstate Commerce Act which relates only to transportation. It establishes the duty of common carriers to furnish communication service upon reasonable request; and requires them where ordered by the commission after a hearing to establish physical connections with other carriers and to establish through routes and charges.

Section 201 (b) provides that charges, practices, classifications, and regulations in connection with such interstate and foreign communication service shall be just and reasonable. It is based upon the Interstate Commerce Act, section 1 (5) and (6), which mentions only charges in connection with communications. The types of messages listed in the classification are taken from the Interstate Commerce Act. The proviso permits carriers subject to the act to enter into or operate under contracts with other common carriers for the exchange of services if the Commission is of the opinion that such contract is not contrary to the public interest. The proviso differs from the present law in that it applies to existing contracts and makes such contracts subject to the jurisdiction of the commission, whereas under present law the commission has no jurisdiction of the contracts. The usual type of contract contemplated is that by which the telegraph companies furnish message service to railroads in return for transportation of men and materials and perhaps for rights-of-way.

Section 202 (a), based upon sections 2 and 3 (1) of the Interstate Commerce Act, forbids unjust and unreasonable discriminations. The present law is followed, and there can be no doubt that reasonable classifications are permitted. This is the section against which some newspapers and stock-exchange firms are protesting because of a possible restriction of leased wires. Their protests are really based upon amendments which Postal Telegraph suggested to the section, which amendments were not adopted by the committee. There is no ground for fear that the law will not recognize existing classes of service.

Section 202 (b) is a new provision designed to make doubly sure that charges for wires in connection with chain broadcasting are within the jurisdiction of the commission.

Section 202 (c) is a penal provision which will apply to those small independent companies made subject to sections 201–205, inclusive, but exempted from the other provisions of the act under section 2 (b).

Section 203, regarding the filing of schedules of charges, is based upon section 6 of the Interstate Commerce Act, which relates only to transportation. It is clear that the commission must have information as to the charges made by the carriers if it is to regulate rates.

Section 204 providing for hearing as to the lawfulness of new charges and for the suspension of such new charges for 3 months in proper case is based upon section 15 (7) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which relates to transportation only. It is an essential power if rates are to be regulated. It did not apply to communications in the Interstate Commerce Act because that act did not require the filing of schedules of charges and therefore the Commission had no information as to the new rates upon which to call for a hearing or to base a suspension.

Section 205, authorizing the commission to prescribe just and reasonable charges and to fix maximum and minimum charges, is taken over from section 15 (1) of the Interstate Commerce Act without important change.

Section 206, covering liability of carriers for damages, is based on section 8 of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 207, dealing with recovery of damages, is based upon section 9 of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 208, relating to complaints to the commission, is based upon section 13 (1) and (2) of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 209, relating to orders for payment of money, is based upon section 16 (1) of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 210, relating to franks and passes, is based upon section 1 (7) of the Interstate Commerce Act. It carries over existing law permitting communication companies to exchange franks for messages and to exchange such franks with railroads for passes.

Section 211 (a), requiring common carriers to file with the commission copies of their contracts with other common carriers, is taken from section 16 (5) of the Interstate Commerce Act. Section 211 (b) authorizes the commission to require the filing of other contracts of any carrier, but permits it to waive the filing of minor contracts. This new provision is desirable to enable the commission to determine whether any such contracts are designed to enable carriers to escape the effects of the law.

Section 212, relating to interlocking directorates and to the dealing by officials in securities of their companies, is based upon section 20 (a) (12) of the Interstate Commerce Act, relating only to transportation.

Section 213, relating to the valuation of carrier property, differs from section 19 (a) of the Interstate Commerce Act in that valuation is made permissive instead of mandatory and the commission is left wider discretion as to the method of valuation to be employed.

Paragraph (e) is taken from the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act of 1933 and requires the commission to keep itself informed of new construction and improvements. The Interstate Commerce Commission has made considerable progress in the valuation of telegraph companies. Paragraph (g) permits it to complete such valuations if requested to do so by the communications commission.

Section 214, relating to extension of lines, is based upon section 1 (18) to (24) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which relates only to transportation. It requires a certificate of public convenience and necessity from the Commission for the construction of a new interstate line but permits the construction of local lines and the supplementing of existing lines without such certificate. The section is designed to prevent useless duplication of facilities, with consequent higher charges upon the users of the service.

Section 215 directs the commission to make three separate studies and to report its findings to Congress, with recommendations for any additional legislation which may be found to be needed.

First. Paragraph (a) directs an examination into transactions relating to the furnishing of equipment, supplies, research, services, finances, credit, or personnel which may affect charges or services. It is designed particularly to develop the facts with respect to intercompany transactions and to the relation of holding companies to operating companies. State regulation of communication companies has been greatly handicapped because the State commissions have been unable to get information of the type which the commission is here directed to obtain.

Second. Paragraph (b) directs the commission to investigate the methods by which and the extent to which the telephone companies are furnishing telegraph service and vice versa. The telegraph companies have complained bitterly that they are being subjected to unfair competition through the entry of the telephone company into the telegraph field using its byproduct facilities. It is contended that the telephone company is taking the cream of the telegraph business without assuming common-carrier telegraph obligations, and that its tactics have seriously handicapped the telegraph companies. The commission is directed to find the facts in the matter.

Third. By paragraph (c) the commission is directed to examine into the so-called "exclusive contracts" by which one telegraph company keeps another from competing for public business in public places such as railroad stations and hotels. Such contracts have been objected to on the ground that they operate as a restraint of competition in the face of the congressional mandate that the telegraph business be competitive.

Section 216, relating to the application of the act to receivers and trustees, follows the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 217, relating to the liability of carriers for acts and omissions of agents, follows the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 218 follows section 12 (1) of the Interstate Commerce Act in authorizing the commission to make inquiry into the management of business of carriers subject to the act. It contains a new provision directing the Commission to keep itself informed of technical developments and improvements in order that the commission may be able effectively to regulate communications. Another new provision authorizes the commission to obtain from holding and affiliated companies information necessary to enable the commission to carry out its duties.

Section 219 providing for annual and other reports is based upon section 20 (1) of the Interstate Commerce Act. It adds new provisions authorizing the commission to require such reports from holding and associated companies and providing that reports shall show the amount and privileges of each class of stock and the names of the 30 largest holders of each class of stock and the amount held by each.

Section 20, paragraphs (a) to (g), relating to accounts records, memoranda, and depreciation, is based upon section 20 (5) to (8) of the Interstate Commerce Act with changes necessary to permit State commissions to prescribe the systems of accounts for the intrastate operation of carriers. Paragraphs (h) to (j) are new. Paragraph (h) authorizes the commission to classify carriers and to except the carriers of particular classes in any State from the requirements of the section where the State commission regulates accounts or depreciation for the particular class of carriers. Paragraph (i) requires the commission to consult the State commissions before prescribing new systems of accounts and paragraph (j) removes any limitation upon the power of a State commission to prescribe, for the purposes of the exercise of its jurisdiction, rates of depreciation. The last three paragraphs named were placed in the bill at the request of the State commissions which feel that their task of regulating intrastate communications will be greatly facilitated by the adoption of these paragraphs.

Section 221 (a), providing the procedure for the consolidation of telephone companies, closely follows section 5 (18) of the Interstate Commerce Act. Paragraph (b) leaves local exchange service to local regulation even where a portion of such local exchange service constitutes interstate communications. It is designed to cover cases of cities located within two States, as Texarkana.

Paragraphs (c) and (d) authorize the commission, in making valuations of telephone property, to value only that part of the property used in interstate or foreign telephone toll service.

TITLE III. PROVISIONS RELATING TO RADIO

Section 301 abolishes the Federal Radio Commission and transfers its functions and powers to the new Commission.

TITLE IV. PROCEDURAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

Section 401, relating to jurisdiction to enforce the act and orders of the commission, follows sections 20 (9) and 16 (12) of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Section 402, relating to the application of the district court jurisdiction acts, adapts the procedure now applicable to orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Inasmuch as the Radio Act of 1927 is not amended by the present bill, the procedure applicable to appeals in matters now coming under that act will continue to be as provided in the Radio Act of 1927. Thus, the review of orders affecting the common-carrier aspects of the commission's jurisdiction will be by the district courts, while that of the radio orders will be by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

The remaining provisions of the bill are believed to be sufficiently explained in the committee report.

I think it would be enlightening to the Members of the House if in their study of this communications problem they would read the report made to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House by Dr. Splawn, our special counsel, on the question of communications, in which he sets out very fully the whole financial and physical set-up of all communications and makes some recommendations that we did not carry into this bill, for the reason we thought it was a wise thing to do to allow this new commission to study these matters in the future and, based upon that report, bring in such recommendations for new legislation as they deem necessary and proper.

Mr. HOPE. Is the report which the gentleman mentions available to the Members of the House?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; it was made some time ago. The first volume was published 5 or 6 weeks ago, and the second volume came out just a day or two ago.

It may be of interest to the House if for just a moment I take the time to explain something about the size and scope of communications in the country.

In the telephone field there are 88,303,231 miles of wire; in telegraph and cable there are 2,336,976 miles of telegraph and cable wire; and power lines are estimated at 200,000 miles.

The capitalization of the telephone is $6,025,678,634; telegraph and cable, $349,542,130; and power—and this is an estimate—$15,000,000,000.

In plant and equipment, the telephone has $4,660,662,997; telegraph and cable, $465,639,421; and in comparison with the railroads, the investments of railroads in plant and equipment is estimated at $26,036,990,995. The capitalization of the railroads is $29,129,250,000.

In the telephone field the average per capita revenue amounts to $8.41 to each person—man, woman, and child—in the United States. In the telegraph and cable field, 88 cents; electric service, $15.82; and in railroad freight, $19.91.

The dividends in these industries for 1932 were about as follows:

In the telephone field $340,000,000; in the telegraph field, $2,500,000; and in the radio communication about one-third of $1,000,000. The estimated number of radio sets in the United States is 16,500,000.

The number of employees is about as follows:

In the telephone field there are 300,000 employees, or 80 percent of all the employees in the communications field; and in the telegraph 65,000, or 15 percent; and in radio about 22,000, or 5 percent.

The telephone companies have sixteen and two-thirds million telephones and 11,000 central offices; the telegraph, 26,000 central offices; and the radio broadcasting is estimated to have 50,000,000 listeners.

The extent of the use of these facilities is about as follows:

In the telephone field it is estimated that per year there are 28,000,000,000 conversations, or 222 per capita. In the telegraph field there are 127,000,000 messages sent per annum, and in radio 2,500,000 messages.

The age of these industries is about as follows:

Telephone, 58 years; telegraph, about 82 years; and the radio had its inception about 38 years ago.

The competition in the industry will run about as follows:

Telephone: American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 95 percent of the business; 100 independent companies, 5 percent of the business.

In the telegraph field: The Western Union, 75 percent; the Postal, 24 percent; and the independents, 1 percent.

In telephone service the American Telephone & Telegraph is practically a monopoly. At present and for several years past American Telephone & Telegraph has paid dividends at the rate of $9 per year.

The things we expect this commission to consider, among others, are these:

There has been great complaint about excessive depreciation charges in these fields. There has been great complaint about so-called "watered stock." There has been no complete regulation of security issues in these fields as there has been since 1920 in the railroad field. They should study this question and make some recommendation to Congress as to further need for regulation along these lines.

These public utilities have been practically a monopoly for quite a long time. There has been no national planning in this field.

Some of the few reasons for the bill are as follows: We think that we ought to bring the regulation of all these communications under one authority.

Today we have the telegraph and telephone and cable, with control and regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the Interstate Commerce Commission in all these years has had the great question of the transportation of the railroads to handle, and they have devoted very little time to any sort of regulation of the telegraph and telephone and cable. There is no hope in the future that they will have more time to devote to it than they have had in the past.

Also, the Post Office has some telegraph jurisdiction and, of course, the Radio Commission has the radio.

The State Department has jurisdiction over cable landings, and the Army and Navy have some radio and telegraph facilities. It is not our intention to take away from the Army or the Navy their small control which they have over radio and telegraph, because we think it would be unwise.

As to the Interior Department, the only control they have is in the public parks of the country, and we think that should remain there. And by and large we think, as the President stated in his message, and by common consent, all these instrumentalities should be brought into this one body.

We are forming a new commission and we are abolishing the existing Commission. The Radio Commission at the present time has a membership of five. We provide that the new commission shall have a membership of seven, and for a very good reason. We anticipate a division of two members for the radio, with the chairman of the commission as a third; we anticipate a division for the telephone of two members, with the chairman of the commission as a third; and we anticipate a division of two for the telegraph, with the chairman as a third. The Senate provided a commission of five and made a division for the telephone and telegraph and one for radio. We believe—and the membership of the House committee believes—that into the telephone and telegraph field at the present time in their breadth and in principle and set-up we should bring some kind of real control, and that there ought to be a division of the telephone and a division of the telegraph. The influential thing about that was that Dr. Splawn, who made the investigation, said that the telephone and telegraph should have a separate division each, and that they will have plenty of business.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Is there anything in the bill that in any way interferes with the telephone companies in favor of the telegraph companies?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not unless it is in the present law. We did not change it.

Mr. SNELL. No change in the present law?

Mr. RAYBURN. We transfer the jurisdiction to the new commission, and the only amendment as to the telegraph and telephone companies is to make effective their transfer.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. The Senate provided for a certain fixed percentage of radiobroadcasting. Is there any provision in the House bill of that kind?

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. MEAD. What is the gentleman's idea?

Mr. RAYBURN. We had up what is known as the "Father Harney amendment", that came to us in the House as it did in the Senate. That provided for the allocation of 25 percent of all the time to religious, educational, and, though I do not believe they used the word "uplift", yet they used a word that corresponds to it. If we begin to take away from the Radio Commission its authority to allocate, we would be in the same position that the Congress would be in if, after giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission its function of regulating railroads and fixing the rates, we would then start out to introduce and pass measures to revise the rate structure. In that way we would probably get into a lot of trouble. Our thought—at least, my thought—was this: If 25 percent should be allocated, or the allocation of it taken away from the Radio Commission, why not take away 30 percent or 40 percent or 100 percent? Also, if you allocate 25 percent to education and religion, then what difficulty is the Radio Commission going to have in dividing that 25 percent between Catholic, Jew, Protestant, and other sects, and also between what colleges, where located, and what else might be supposed to be taken into consideration for morals, education, and uplift? Our committee took that position, and we believe it is a wise one.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. Would not an attempt by the committee or by anyone to make this change so involve the broadcasting structure all over the United States that it would have to be studied carefully by some other commission in order to arrive at some equitable solution of the problem?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and if we do this, then it will practically amount to a revocation of every broadcasting license in the United States, because they must all be revised.

Mr. MEAD. If the gentleman will permit, the first proposal in the Senate specifically allocated 25 percent. That was amended, however, and the provision in the Senate bill merely refers the entire matter to the commission for study.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is a matter that will be in conference.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. To ask the gentleman from Texas if he would indicate the possible reaction of the other body to the action of his committee in eliminating title III, the special radio provisions, and preserving the existing radio law.

Mr. RAYBURN. I could not do it. The committee of which Senator DILL is chairman, and of which Senator COUZENS was formerly chairman for a while, studied radio, had long hearings, as I understand it, and I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] will bear me out, that they reported a rather far-reaching bill during the last session of Congress.

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. It did not pass. They wanted to incorporate some of it as a provision of this law. I do not know what position the House committee would take. We did not think we should go into a revision of the radio law, and I think personally it is much better to go ahead and formulate this commission and let them study all these questions and make their recommendations in the light of their study.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The reason I asked the question is that it has been brought to my attention that some of the small operators are very much concerned over title III of the act as it appears in the Senate bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know they are; but we did not want to go into that, and in writing our amendment we have left title III out.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. I notice there is a section here that deals with procedural and administrative matters. Do the provisions of this bill materially alter the procedural provisions of the existing radio legislation?

Mr. RAYBURN. Io do not think so. I know they do not as far as the administration under the Interstate Commerce Act is concerned. We did not intend to do that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I understand that some of the stations are now over their quota in their assignment of radio units. Is it the implication of the bill that if the Commission should so find and seek a more equitable distribution to put arbitrarily some of the private radio stations out of business? It would be almost necessary to do that.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is a matter in the hands of the Commission, because whatever power the Commission has now this new commission will have in the administration of the law.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Was that question raised in the course of the deliberations of the committee?

Mr. RAYBURN. All those questions were raised, and we decided to leave them out by leaving the Radio Act as it is at the present time.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Under the present Radio Act they can reallocate them. They grant a license for only 6 months.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. The only possibility which I can see is in the procedural provisions.

Mr. RAYBURN. We did not intend to do that.

Mr. MILLIGAN. As I understand it, the same procedure is retained for the Radio Commission in this new commission.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is my impression also. I thank the Members of the House for their attention. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing of great importance to add to what the chairman has said. I agree substantially with what he has said.

I approached this question with considerable prejudice against the formation of any new commissions, but I found that the control of the telegraph and telephone, which is now under the Interstate Commerce Act, had not received very much attention, because, as the chairman has said, the Interstate Commerce Commission was entirely occupied with railway communication. Several things of interest have developed in the course of the examination of this question. In the first place, with regard to the very important matter of telephone communication, it developed that some 97½ or 98 percent of all telephone communication is intrastate, which this bill does not affect.

At one of our first hearings we had before us the State commissioners, to see what their attitude was. Their attitude in general was that they needed this bill to help them to do their own intrastate duties well. In the course of that examination I asked the men who represented the State commissioners whether, as far as they knew, there was any nation in the world that had as efficient telephone service as the United States. They all said, "No." Then I said, "Is there any particular criticism as to the rates for the 2½ percent of communication which is interstate?" They said, "No." Then it occurred to me that if that is so, if we have the best service and the interstate rates are not to be criticized, what is the use of doing anything about it? It developed as the hearings went on that by reason of improvements and inventions and the mechanical part of the service, telephone and telegraph and radio are becoming more and more interconnected, so that it is hardly possible to regulate one without regulating the other. I think, however, that the House should feel as I do, that it is very much to the credit of the men who founded and who have developed the great telephone system in this country, that they have done it on such absolutely sound, honest, and conservative lines.

It may interest the Members of this House to know that not only is there no "water" in the capitalization of the telephone companies but that the company has received $114 for every $100 share of stock, so there is no "water" in the company. As the State commissioners have said, in general there has been no complaint of the rates and no complaint of the service.

I do not know so much about the telegraph companies, but I believe the capitalization of those companies is sound. I know still less as to radio. Of course, there has been great talk as to "water" and supersalesmanship of radio stock. I should have been glad if this legislation had confined itself to setting up a committee to investigate and report; but as to radio, that is exactly what this act does. All legislation about radio is found in section 301, which provides that the Federal Radio Commission is hereby abolished, and all the duties, powers, and functions of the Federal Radio Commission under the Radio Act of 1927, as amended, or under any other provision of law, are hereby imposed upon and vested in the new commission. That is the only thing that is in this bill about the power over radio.

As to the other parts of the bill, with regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, you will find in section 215 and in section 202 very specific provisions against any discrimination in service or in charges. Of course, it is not possible, with human imperfections, to form any commission which may not do unfair things, but in a Government of this sort, covering such a great extent and such enormous range of matters, I do not see any other solution if any services are to be regulated except to form a commission of this sort and gradually make rules and regulations from experience. As the chairman has said, it is much safer to give this commission the power to do that than to attempt, with what little knowledge we have, to lay down a code which will cover all sorts of conditions and all sorts of individual practices. We found that out in the N.I.R.A. All that any regulatory body can safely do is to lay down a set of general principles and allow the parties who are doing the work to formulate the details as to carrying out those principles.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. Does this bill give the new commission any more power over the regulation of radio than the present Radio Commission has?

Mr. MERRITT. It does not.

Mr. FULMER. Is it not a fact that about all this bill hopes to accomplish is to transfer the activities of the Radio Commission and certain jurisdiction on the part of the Post Office Department and the Interstate Commerce Commission to this new commission?

Mr. MERRITT. That is right.

Mr. FULMER. May I ask the gentleman a further question? Is it not a fact, from the testimony that was given before your committee, and especially the testimony of Dr. Strawn, that the main thing is that a thorough investigation should be made of the radio corporations at this time?

Mr. MERRITT. That is right.

Mr. FULMER. I will say that I introduced a resolution at the beginning of the session; and from all the information I have, it would go to show that a thorough investigation should be made; but apparently the Department of Commerce recommended this bill to get away from an investigation.

Mr. MERRITT. There is a provision in this bill that the commission shall report by January 1935.

Mr. FULMER. That investigation will be made by the new commission?

Mr. MERRITT. That investigation will be made by the new commission; yes, sir. Of course, the advantage of that is that the commission can make a report, Congress can act as its wisdom counsels it to act, and then that same commission, knowing all the facts, can carry it out better than if they were not already acquainted with the subject matter. I think it is good business, because, just like the Interstate Commerce Commission, they act on their judgment, and the Congress on its judgment, and the combined wisdom of the two bodies will result in better regulation than if they were independent.

Mr. FULMER. Is it not a fact that the present Radio Commission is of that opinion at this time, but they are not interfering with radio operation?

Mr. MERRITT. I think the difference is that this new commission will have acquaintance not only with radio but also with the telegraph and telephone; they will all work together.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman called our attention to section 215 relating to uniform charges for the same service. Does the gentleman have any knowledge of telephone companies giving free privileges to use the long-distance telephone to certain people in the country; in other words, giving them the franking privilege over their long-distance lines?

Mr. MERRITT. I do not know whether they do or not.

Mr. PATMAN. Does not the gentleman know that that has been done in the past?

Mr. MERRITT. I assume that is true of every company, especially in regard to its employees.

Mr. PATMAN. And if this law is enacted that practice would be prohibited.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I assume from the fact this bill was reported out unanimously by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that the bill must be meritorious and that it merely transfers powers that are already authorized to one separate commission. I, therefore, do not propose to take much time in discussing the merits of the proposals before us; and I do not assume to know very much about it except the general purpose of the legislation.

I admit that I am somewhat worried over the fact that the Democratic administration finds it necessary to employ hundreds of publicity agents to support the socialistic policies of the administration and the policies of the President and of the Democratic Party.

Four or five years ago some of us on the minority side thought that President Hoover knew something about publicity. He probably was the best publicity manager that we had ever had as President of the United States up to that time, but President Hoover was a mere piker compared to this administration, which has completely outclassed him. There are literally hundreds of paid publicity agents throughout the United States receiving substantial salaries. I venture to say that there are over a hundred who receive salaries in excess of $3,000, a very large proportion of them former members of the press—intelligent, likeable, and competent. Go to any department of the Government, small or large, or to any bureau of the Government, and you will find a publicity agent. They are frank and open about it; you will find the title right on the door. It may not always be "publicity agent", for they have various terms; it may be "director of publicity", "agent of publicity", "director of bureau of information", "public-relations division", and so on. Then there are hundreds of people employed at Government expense who clip newspaper articles and who mimeograph publicity articles. The result is that we are in the midst of a government of propaganda, by propaganda and ballyhoo, largely for the Democratic Party at the expense of the taxpayers of America. I think that fair-minded Democrats must sympathize with the Republicans who have not even got a look in. We have not got a chance at all. The only rights we have are once in a while to take the floor of the House of Representatives when there are about a score of Members present and express our views. Until recently it has been very difficult to get on the radio. A year ago Republicans could not get on the radio anywhere, but I imagine they feel they can be generous with the Republicans now because they keep adding to their publicity agents every time a Republican talks on the radio. So they can afford to let one or two of us speak now and then and develop an excuse for some more jobs for deserving Democrats to handle publicity.

I think it is unfortunate that the radio is controlled by the administration or terrorized by the administration to the extent that the policies of the administration literally burn up the radio time day and night.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Possibly the reason they will not let you Republicans talk on the radio is for fear you might start a filibuster.

Mr. FISH. No; they are afraid we will convert the country; and they are in with the Democrats, as the Democrats are in power. But you will have the same experience we have had. We have been in power for many years, and all the big interests try to exploit the party in power. They are like barnacles on a ship, they will grab hold of you just as they grabbed hold of us in the past. They will not let go as long as you are in power.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman spoke about the number of publicity agents in this administration. The lesser number in the Hoover administration is probably accounted for by the fact that the Hoover administration had nothing to publicize.

Mr. FISH. Well, for several years they did not need any publicity as the Democrats do today to take care of the socialistic doctrines of the new deal.

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to say to the "Senator" from Ohio [laughter] that you may have fooled the people this year with the depreciated dollar; but when you increase the cost of living another 25 percent and give them a 50-cent dollar, then you will need all the help you can get from the radio. It is all right now, because some of them think you are just soaking the rich; but when the time comes that they realize they are getting soaked too, then look out. You will have need of every publicity agent you now have and a lot more besides, hundreds of them, to make this new deal go over and make the consumer and American wage earner think they are getting somewhere when they pay for a 50-percent increase in cost of living with a 50-cent dollar.

I hold in my hand a clipping from a magazine. I do not want to do an injustice to the Democratic Party, of course. [Laughter.] I would not think of that for a moment, nor would I interfere with your publicity agents or other deserving Democrats. But here is an article published in the American Political Science Review of October 1933, entitled "American Government and Politics."

It is entitled "Campaign Funds in a Depression Year", by Louise Overacker, of Wellesley College, and reads as follows:

> The Democratic records show a curious situation so far as radio expenses are concerned. During the campaign itself, only $182,451 was spent for this purpose; but the list of unpaid obligations filed at the end of the year showed $160,964 outstanding in radio bills, more than $100,000 of which was owed to the National Broadcasting Co. Almost all of these debts remained unpaid on May 31, 1933. * * * Such a situation is certainly unhealthy and gives rise to the suspicion that there may have been some kind of understanding between the Democratic National Committee and the radio companies.

I do not want to make specific charges on a matter of this kind. I assume, of course, all Democrats are honest, but what commitments were made during the campaign by party managers and whether any promises were indirectly made to radio corporations I am not able to prove. At the same time, it does look as if something were wrong if these bills have not been paid. They ought to be paid in fairness to yourselves and your own party and to the country.

I should like to propose an amendment, or I should like to have some Democrat propose it instead, that no public official or member of his family shall be paid any money for speaking over the radio. There is no reason in the world why the secretary to the President, Mr. Howe, should receive $900 for making a radio speech that is not worth 9 cents.

Mr. HEALEY. How is the gentleman going to prevent it?

Mr. FISH. All you have to do is to write into the law a definite prohibition that no public official or member of his family shall receive any money for speaking over the radio.

Mr. HEALEY. Or any other place.

Mr. FISH. That applies to both Republicans and Democrats, because we expect to be in power in 1936.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman said, as I understand him, that in the campaign the Republicans were unable to get time over the radio.

Mr. FISH. No; I did not make that statement. We pay for our time. I think the Republicans paid the bills for their time in the last Presidential campaign. A year ago some of us Republicans could not get time, but today a few of us can.

Mr. BLAND. May I call the gentleman's attention to the specific provision that equal facilities shall be given to all candidates and parties.

Mr. FISH. During the campaign we paid for our time.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLOOM. In reading this clipping, there is no mention that the Democratic National Committee owes this money or any part of it.

Mr. FISH. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. BLOOM. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have read the article over very carefully.

Mr. FISH. As of May 31, all of those debts remained unpaid.

Mr. BLOOM. It does not say by whom?

Mr. FISH. It is by the Democratic National Committee. You read the paper, and then we will discuss that matter later. There is no dispute about that proposition, and I am not going to quibble with the gentleman.

I want to show you Democrats how far you have gone on this publicity question. I do not know how far you are going, but you are away ahead of anything the Republicans ever thought of. Here is a new wrinkle in the T.V.A.

Mr. BLOOM. What is the T.V.A.?

Mr. FISH. The Tennessee Valley Authority. It is that socialistic venture down in Tennessee. The gentleman will know more about it when he pays his bills next year.

> Indeed, it was the T.V.A. which devised a new wrinkle in the promotion and propaganda field when it entered into a 4-months' contract with a leading advertising agency of New York City, which was announced by Director E. Lilienthal on April 28.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not going to raise a point of order at this time, but I shall after this. The discussion and debate is supposed to be and must be under the rule confined to the bill. I would appreciate it very much if the gentleman would confine himself to the bill, because I do not want to let him run along and then have to object to someone else.

Mr. FISH. This article merely goes on to say:

> This is the first time a department of the Federal Government has retained an advertising and merchandising agency for consulting services. The cost is $10,000.

It is just a sample to what extent the Democratic administration has gone to waste public funds and to use propaganda to support the gradual loss of confidence in the socialistic features of the new deal.

Mr. BLOOM. He is from the gentleman's district.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY].

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I have no special desire to speak at length on this bill today. My natural inclination is to bow to the superior wisdom and experience of our very able and courageous chairman; but I had been hopeful that those who were chiefly responsible for amendments which were offered to this bill on the other side of the Capitol would be afforded an opportunity to make some reference to them in the debate here today. Because they are unavoidably absent, I feel obliged to make some particular reference to one suggested amendment already very briefly discussed.

Those of you who have read the Senate bill know that provision is made therein for a study of the allocation of radio time, which would properly take care of education, religion, agriculture, and labor.

I have not yet heard any serious reason why the Radio Commission, or the new organization which will administer this bill, should not make such a study or should not have authority to reallocate time to those all-important groups and institutions. Of course, every Member of the Congress knows that these particular groups represent the very cornerstone of our Government, and that education, religion, labor, and agriculture should be afforded a proper time to tell their story, and to spread their advantages over the radio broadcasting systems of this country.

During committee consideration of this bill I offered a more modified amendment than had been proposed. I was particularly prompted to do that by the very able presentation of Father Harney, and partially prompted by the interest of many Members of the Congress in some such addition to this bill.

I am not going to offer an amendment now. I choose to go along with the majority of my committee, which has perhaps wisely decided that this is not the time nor the place to offer this amendment. I continue to be hopeful, however, that if the bill is passed in its present form, without amendment by the House, that the conferees will give further careful consideration to that part of the Senate bill. I would like to take these few minutes more of your time to express the hope on my part, and I am sure on the part of many others, that those who will administer this law will be particularly careful of radio, and not permit it to fall into the careless ways of the motion-picture industry. Most of us are hopeful that there will not be built up the tyranny that exists in the motion-picture field, which allows certain producers to ride roughshod over the interests of independent theater owners and a great majority of the careful and clean-thinking people. I have no such fear, but I think I would be a little bit remiss if I did not express my feeling and give what I think is the principal reason why the people concerned with this amendment want this subject further considered.

I know that the great majority of radio-broadcasting companies—and I am certain more than a majority of those representing the great networks—are determined to give these groups a fair allotment of time and proper representation; but there has been evidence of real selfishness on the part of one group, and that particular selfishness is what prompted these proposed amendments; that selfishness is what prompted this particular portion of the Senate bill. These people have now within their own hands a means of correction. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY].

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of submitting to the House an editorial written by John Borg, editor and publisher of the Bergen Evening Record.

The editorial, entitled "The New Deal Critics Forget to Remember", appeared in that newspaper published at Hackensack, N.J., Thursday, May 31, 1934. It is probably the finest editorial yet written on the phases of our national recovery. Accordingly, it deserves the thoughtful consideration of every Member of this House.

In presenting Mr. Borg's editorial, permit me to pay tribute to his high character, his marked ability, and his record of useful service in promoting the cause of good government. A Republican, he has always risen above partisan politics; and, not without sacrifices, he has faithfully and unswervingly dedicated the columns of his newspaper to the service of that great majority of unorganized taxpayers which constitutes the backbone of Bergen County, N.J. His influence, nevertheless, is not limited or confined to Bergen County, for his ability and energy, which have been combined in him for the promotion of the public welfare, are felt and appreciated widely in the State and Nation.

[From the Bergen Evening Record, Thursday, May 31, 1934]

NEW DEAL CRITICS FORGET TO REMEMBER

If intelligent critics of the National Industrial Recovery Act would realize that the Nation is confronted, not by a depression, but by an era of drastic economic readjustment, they would probably commend rather than condemn the fundamental principles of the new deal.

There have doubtless been many errors of omission and commission. It would be surprising if the reverse were true. The problems which harassed the United States last year were without precedent in our national experience. Necessarily we were compelled to embark on an uncharted economic sea to reach the harbor of sane solution.

Our debts—private, corporate, and public—exceeded the Nation's total wealth for the first time in our history. We were collectively insolvent. Commodity prices had to be raised in an attempt to increase the capital values dependent on them. That was surely a meritorious effort to restore our national solvency, to enable private as well as public debtors to meet their just obligations, and to prevent complete economic collapse with its attendant possibilities for the collapse of our civilization itself.

Such an end justified the employment of every means at the Government's command to prevent it. Out of that travail was born N.R.A., which socialized the world's greatest capitalistic nation, figuratively, overnight.

Ten million unemployed had to be fed, clothed, and housed; property rights had to be subordinated to human needs; concentrated wealth had to be redistributed; wages and salaries had to be raised to increase the ability of the masses to consume our unsalable agricultural and industrial products; and, above all, a revolution with all its attendant bloodshed and social intolerances had to be averted.

Instead, therefore, of damning N.R.A. and all its works, the conservatives of America ought to be supporting it, at least in principle. It enabled them to salvage many of the advantages and comforts of the old individualistic system, whereas without its orderly control of the crisis they might have lost everything, including something more precious to them than individual wealth.

Despite its minor frailties and faults, the fundamental principles of N.R.A. are still vital to the reconstruction program, now merely in its initial stages. The Nation is not going to be socialized—it already has been.

Our great middle class, constituting 95 percent of the country's population, is equally impatient of its 1 percent of millionaires and its 4 percent of bums who wouldn't work if they could. The chaos of early 1933 compelled a new deal; they got it, and are now experiencing its first stages. To imagine that they would permit its essential benefits to be scrapped without a fight is self-delusive. It will, therefore, probably be strengthened instead of weakened as its logical sequences are developed by trial and error.

An ultimate possibility is that corporation executives, excluding those who risk their own capital by owning actual control of their enterprises, may be restricted in the emoluments of their positions. Practically all corporations whose stocks are listed on our exchanges are owned by the public and not by the directors and officers who manage them by the grace of stockholders' proxies. To that extent they are therefore quasi-public corporations and might be legally classified as such.

The principle seems equitable that no quasi-public corporation executive, selling nothing but his services to the passive stockholders who take all the business risk, should receive more for such services than the President of the United States, who manages the largest business enterprise in the country.

It might even be argued with some logic that such executives should be restricted in their salaries to the proportion their gross business volume bears to the annual gross expenditures of the Federal Government. Thus quasi-public corporation executives would be scaled down from the President's annual $75,000 salary in the proportion that their annual business bears to our four-billion-a-year National Budget, the resultant savings to be passed along to wage earners, consumers, and stockholders to increase mass buying power.

All of this may be some years ahead of the procession which the economic chaos of our past financial jazz era set in motion. Certainly N.R.A. did not create the conditions which almost engulfed the world's richest Nation. It was merely erected afterward in a desperate effort to control the aftermath and provide some semblance of orderly direction out of the abyss.

Obviously, if damnation is merited, we ought therefore to damn the indiscretions and excesses which undermined the country's economic health, not to curse the remedies that had to be emergently applied to save its life.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York—and we all like him, even though he does complain a good deal—reminds me of a time when I was selling hogs down in the South. I stopped at a railroad station, and there was a cracker sitting there with a 'coon dog and the dog was sitting on his haunches dismally howling. I said to the cracker, "Why does the dog howl?" "Well", he said, "he has got the hookworm", and I said, "Why does the hookworm make him howl?" and he said, "He just howls", and I said, "I want a better reason than that", and finally he said, "Well, to tell you the truth, that there dog is sitting on a sand burr and he hasn't got sense enough to get off of it, and he just sits here and howls because it hurts." [Laughter.]

Now, my friend from New York is trying to find issues, but being unable to do so he just naturally comes up here and howls, day by day, about the Roosevelt administration. [Laughter.]

I am deeply pained that it was my misfortune to miss the free-for-all scrap that was staged in the House yesterday, and the various and sundry roll calls pertaining thereto.

When it comes to answering roll calls, I yield to no Member of this House. When it comes to a proposition of sitting on this floor day after day listening to debate, taking part in debate, and fighting for the oppressed and distressed common people I yield to no Member of this House. When it comes to putting forth heroic efforts and giving the best there is in me for the rights of the common people, I yield to no Member in a free-for-all scrap such as was staged here yesterday.

My reason for missing the roll calls and the belligerency that took place was because of a necessary visit to my home State of Ohio. No; I did not go back for political reasons. I did not return to see how the horizon looked with reference to my campaign. I returned for the sole purpose of participating in an event that comes but once in the life of every Member of this Congress—the graduation from high school of his eldest son.

Had I been blessed with the income and wealth of some, I might have made this round trip to Ohio upon palatial, expensive, air-conditioned trains and Pullmans. But not having been anointed with the wealth and income of the silk-stockinged aristocracy, I made the trip in my faithful Ford, using one day, Thursday, to go to Ohio, the commencement exercises being held Thursday night, and using the next day, Friday, to drive back through a sun-baked and dust-clouded Commonwealth with prevailing temperatures of 103 degrees.

I am here today, back in the harness for the farmers, the unemployed, the war veterans, and small business men and producers. Upon arrival I was glad to learn that the roll calls I missed were practically of unimportance, since they were forced by the Republican side in their ill-fated and abortive attempt to filibuster against the Roosevelt recovery program and the N.R.A.

Without regard to the merits of the facts found or alleged to have been found by the National Recovery Review Board, the significant fact is its bold recommendation as an official body of the United States Government to the President of the United States to pursue a course of State socialism.

A study of the history of this Board and of its members and agents leads one to the unavoidable and alarming conclusion that the final recommendation of the Board was part of a preconceived plan on the part of some of its members and their advisers to undermine the confidence of the people of the United States in their Government in a time of national emergency. They used this opportunity for high public service to spread socialistic and communistic doctrine on the front page of all the newspapers throughout the land.

When an obscure professor from Indiana became alarmed at certain alleged statements of subordinate officials at a dinner party, this body conducted an investigation to determine whether or not our administration was infected with communistic and socialistic doctrines. How much more important it is that we make clear to the American people just how this scandalous report came to be made. If it were not for the high position that this board holds and the fact that its report was an official message to the President of the United States, the personal theories of government held by some of its members would not be of any importance. But the way this report was publicized and the way that certain Members of Congress have taken up its battle cry makes it imperative as our duty to the people of the United States that we clear this matter up. A slight investigation into the real facts demonstrates the obvious bad faith of the board. In order to lay the basis for the astounding recommendation to abandon the recovery movement and move to state socialism, naturally it had to be demonstrated that the National Recovery Administration was not succeeding. Since this was a large order, the oppression of the little fellow was taken up as the most convenient vehicle.

Now, of course, there are cases where the codes have worked some hardships against small enterprise. It was this very fact and the difficulty of bringing to light these few cases that caused General Johnson to recommend the appointment of this special board so that the flexible machinery of N.R.A. could right the wrongs. However, the board found that as a general rule N.R.A. uniformly promoted monopoly and oppressed small enterprise.

To get away from allegations and counterallegations here are some facts: Dun & Bradstreet's review shows that the failures per hundred establishments with liabilities under $100,000 progressed steadily from 0.34 in 1919 to 1.38—a record high—in 1932; or, in other words, out of every 1,000 small business men in 1919, 3 went into bankruptcy. The cutthroat competition of the chain store and the large manufacturer, by virtue of quantity buying and production, forced the little fellow to the wall, so that in 1932 there were over 13 small business men out of every 1,000 who had to give up the ship—an increase of over 400 percent. Even during the boom years of 1924 to 1928 over nine out of every thousand small enterprises went into bankruptcy every year. Now, during 1933, especially since the passage of the Recovery Act and the codes, we find that at the end of the year there was not even one little fellow going into bankruptcy out of every thousand but that only 1 out of every 2,000 failed. But, of course, everyone that does fail lays his failure to N.R.A.

I would like to pause here to read an editorial appearing in the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer for May 17, 1934, which brings out this point:

NOT SO SICK

It is current fashion for the foes of Roosevelt recovery to beat their breasts on behalf of the little man. One is told that N.R.A. has become the handmaiden of monopoly and that its codes are putting a millstone around the neck of all the little businesses of all the little men.

Yet a report from Washington that the codes for the service industries will be abandoned brings several thousand protests to the N.R.A., mostly from the dry-cleaning industry, admittedly one of N.R.A.'s problem children. Manifestly most of them must have come from the little man for there are not that many big ones.

Another index of the business health of the little man is the steady decline in commercial failures. Last week, reports Dun & Bradstreet, failures were fewer than for any similar period in 14 years. They numbered 222 against 437 a year ago, and a weekly average of over 400 in predepression years.

Still another indication that all the little men are not dead or dying is the substantial decrease in the number of vacant stores noted in Cleveland and almost every other city. They should be increasing if one is to believe the recovery critics' tales of woe, for in the main it is the little men who do business in the little stores.

Many little men in business have been having their troubles, even as have the big men. But many of them seem to be convalescing very successfully.

The Darrow Board heard the evidence of the few but disregarded the evidence of the many, and what is more, disregarded the facts.

There is another side to the picture that the Board neglected. The National Industrial Recovery Act gives a mandate to the administration not only to rehabilitate industry, large and small, but to reemploy the millions of destitute workers; the individual worker is the real little fellow in this economic world. For him the Darrow report had little or nothing to say. And yet the most recent report on reemployment, that of the National Industrial Conference Board, in a survey issued May 23, estimated the total unemployed for the month of May as 7,907,000. This figure represents a decline of 114,000 from March 1934, and a reduction of 5,296,000, or 40.1 percent, as compared with the total unemployed in March 1933, the high point of unemployment in this country.

So we see that there has been a tremendous improvement in employment and in the condition of the small business man under N.R.A. But there was another mandate in the act—that the benefits accruing to the employer and to the employee should not impair the public interest. In other words, the interest of the consumer was also to be protected. We have heard much from self-styled champions of the consumer—which means champions of the whole people—admitting the benefits to industry and labor, but contending that prices increased too rapidly and that recovery is, therefore, more apparent than real, since the consumer cannot afford to buy at existing price levels. These allegations are not supported by the facts. The columns of our public press, especially those appearing under financial and business pages, are literally swamped with statistics from reliable sources to the effect that production is booming and that the volume of unit sales is higher than at any time since the crash. There are more and more people who are willing to buy and are buying at existing price levels. Certainly it is not the employers of the country that are doing all this buying of consumer goods. The consumer is the employee, and as his wages go up he is buying more and more, causing more production and more employment. The vicious descending spiral has been reversed and the theory of the National Industrial Recovery Act has been vindicated.

INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY IS FOUND ADVANCING ALONG WIDER FRONT—SURVEY REVEALS FIRST QUARTER'S BUSINESS MOVED FORWARD VIGOROUSLY—GAINS RECORDED IN PRODUCTION, SALES, PRICES, PAY ROLLS, AND EMPLOYMENT

NEW YORK, April 16.—Industry moved ahead vigorously in the first quarter of 1934. Increased activity, visible in a number of lines late in 1933, was extended to all major industries in the first 3 months of 1934, with gains in production, sales, prices, employment, and pay rolls recorded on a far greater scale than in the corresponding period of any recent year, according to a survey of industry for the first quarter of 1934, which has just been completed by the research department of Dun & Bradstreet, Inc.

The extent of the industrial gains is shown in the trends of seven primary factors, the survey points out, all of which point to but one conclusion: That American industry enters the second quarter of 1934 with recovery in full swing.

The preceding months have been a period of steady progress and outstanding achievement, emphasized and made more striking by the low level from which the forward movement began. Fundamental conditions not only have improved greatly but the momentum of industry has been accelerated sharply.

PRODUCTION UP 10.8 PERCENT

The extent of the industrial improvement in the first quarter of 1934 is shown in the movement of the index of industrial activity during that period. The December index figure was 71.6. In the following 3 months it advanced successively to 72.5 to 73.2, and finally, in March, to 79.3. The gain over the December level of activity was 10.8 percent. This is the most impressive first-quarter-activity increase recorded in any recent year.

A continuance of the expansion of the volume of industrial sales also was a feature of the first 3 months of the year. For the first time in a number of years the sales of each one of the 25 industries chartered was higher than in the corresponding quarter of the year before.

In the third quarter of 1933 the sales average of 16 of the 25 industries were over 100 percent. In the fourth quarter 100 percent or more was shown by 23 of the 25. Among the most outstanding gains were those of steel, automotive, chemical, and household-products industries.

EMPLOYMENT AND WAGES GAIN

First-quarter wage increases were of striking proportions, manufacturing pay rolls in February reaching a new high in a gain of 12 percent over the January figures, restoring a peak untouched since early in 1931, and making the greatest 1-month improvement in 15 years. The increases affected workers practically in all industries, and applied both to salary and to wage earners. The average increase in wage scales was slightly greater than the average increase in salary scales.

The gains in employment in the first quarter of 1934 were equally as impressive as the wage increases. The average total of unemployed in the period was a little more than 8,000,000, whereas the total for the corresponding period of 1933 was over 13,000,000. The same totals, on the basis of 50,000,000 normally gainfully employed, show a gain in employment of 14.2 percent.

There is no need to recount endless statistics. Every reliable index now at hand shows that since the adoption of the codes of fair competition under N.I.R.A. there has been a steady recovery caused by the fact that the fundamental principles on which it is based have been put to work and are working as anticipated. When the National Recovery Act started its effort, business was stagnated. The plea was heard on all sides to start the great flywheel of industry. The President's plan was simple. If all employers would shorten their hours and take on more men at higher wages, this would increase the purchasing power of the great army of the unemployed who had had nothing to buy anything with for years. This was to be the spark which would turn the great wheel over. That is exactly what has happened. Millions of men have been reemployed and pay rolls are increasing and nothing now can stop it, not even abortive attempts to sidetrack the issue by pessimistic recommendations of a resort to state socialism as our only way out.

But people are inclined to lose sight of this simple fact. In the beginning of March the Administrator paused to take a breath in the tremendous task of supervising the formulation of codes by industry groups and asked for constructive criticism. No such appeal was ever before made by an administrative officer of our Government in so important a position. The well-founded criticism was received with open arms and was used and is now being used in the reorganization of N.R.A. along lines suited to its new task of supervising the administration of the codes formed during the past year. Criticism makes news. The slow, steady, internal improvement does not make news. This is always a fact, but people are inclined to forget it. They see only the critical side and do not see the answer.

There are those who say that N.R.A. is too rigid and inflexible. Nothing is further from the fact. A more flexible method of administration has never before been devised. The recent action of the President in relaxing the trade-practice provisions of the local service trades, except where there is majority agreement in each locality, is a perfect example of this flexibility. Yet destructive critics allege that this forward step toward consolidation and improvement of administrative methods after fair trial is the beginning of the crack-up. This is typical of the destructive and subversive attacks to which I have referred.

It is time that we reconsidered the fundamental philosophy of N.R.A. as expounded by the President on June 16, 1933, when he signed this act. Let us look at some of the things he said then and see how well he foresaw the problems and how well his program has been carried out. He said:

The law I have just signed was passed to put people back to work—to let them buy more of the products of farms and factories and start our business at a living rate again. This task is in two stages—first, to get as many hundreds of thousands of the unemployed back on the pay roll by snowfall, and second, to plan for a better future for the longer pull. While we shall not neglect the second, the first stage is an emergency job. It has the right-of-way.

Now, many of N.R.A.'s critics have complained because the whole army of 12,000,000 unemployed was not absorbed by industry by last Christmas, and alleged that the original promise had been broken. The President said many hundreds of thousands. As a matter of fact, the figure actually was in the millions. I quote again:

In my inaugural I laid down the simple proposition that nobody is going to starve in this country. It seems to me to be equally plain that no business which depends for existence on paying less than a living wage to its workers has any right to continue in this country.

Here again may I pause to point out that critics of N.R.A. who shed crocodile tears for the little fellow are weeping for those who owe their existence in industry to paying less than a decent living wage. Of all of the complaints of small business men received by N.R.A., over 90 percent can be traced to the complaint that they are unable to pay the minimum wage and to abide by the maximum hour provisions of the codes.

Now, we come to the fundamental philosophy of this law. The President said:

The challenge of this law is whether we can sink selfish interest and present a solid front against a common peril.

It is a challenge to industry which has long insisted that given the right to act in unison, it could do much for the general good which has hitherto been unlawful. From today it has that right.

Now, there are critics of N.R.A. who have filled the public press and the ether with outcries of "regimentation." I wish to call your attention to the fact that not one code has been adopted which was not written by the industry and agreed upon by the vast majority of that industry. There is no regimentation by fiat—there is self-organization by the will of industry itself, under the rules established by this Democratic Congress.

The President further said that—

> This law is also a challenge to labor. Workers, too, are here given a new charter of rights long sought and hitherto denied—

Further—

> This is not a law to foment discord and it will not be executed as such.

Now, there are vociferous critics of the administration who claim that N.R.A. has sold out to labor. Other critics say that N.R.A. has sold out to industry The very fact that the volume of this criticism is so evenly divided is an indication of how well N.R.A. has done its job. Every time a benefit is given to labor there are those in industry who squeal. Every time labor is not given all that its extreme advocates demand there are those who make violent outcry. The very essence of N.R.A.'s job is compromise. It must constantly compromise conflicting special interests for the benefit of the public interest. This is the very essence of democratic government.

The President foresaw on the date he signed this act that this resolving of conflicting interests was the most difficult problem before us, and he said:

> It is further a challenge to administration. We are relaxing some of the safeguards of the antitrust laws. The public must be protected against the abuses that led to their enactment, and to this end we are putting in place of old principles of unchecked competition some new Government controls. They must, above all, be impartial and just. Their purpose is to free business—not to shackle it—and no man who stands on the constructive, forward-looking side of his industry has anything to fear from them. To such men the opportunities for individual initiative will open more amply than ever.

He further stated that—

> Government must guard those who play the game for the general good against those who may seek selfish gains from the unselfishness of others, and it must be done quickly. We must see that our haste does not permit favoritism and graft. All this is a heavy load for any government, and one that can be borne only if we have the patience, cooperation, and support of people everywhere.

The facts and statistics which I have set forth above show how well this challenge has been answered.

But there are still those who are skeptical. There are those who becloud these fundamental facts with insidious propaganda. The President foresaw this, too, the day he signed the act. He said:

> Finally, this law is a challenge to our whole people. * * * This great cooperation can succeed only if those who bravely go forward to restore jobs have aggressive public support and those who lag are made to feel the full weight of public disapproval.

The worst enemies of our country in a time of emergency are those who attempt to destroy the faith of the people in their power to meet the emergency. One of the most insidious ways to shake that faith is by stirring up rumblings of communism and socialism.

I cannot believe that Clarence Darrow, who in his younger days was one of the most able lawyers of his time, would, upon sober reflection, repeat his demoralizing recommendation. I cannot think that he would allow himself to be misguided and misled further by those counselors and intimates who have apparently impressed their own cynical and destructive theories of government and human relations upon him. However, I do feel that the activities of these counselors, who took advantage of Mr. Darrow and of the position of high public trust which he holds to propagate their political theories contrary to the Constitution of the United States and in violation of the oath of office of this Board, should be investigated, particularly with regard to their apparent attempt to corrupt Members of the Congress with soviet and communistic doctrines.

In conclusion, it is heartening to note that some of our leaders and molders of public thought, who through the darkest hours of N.R.A., while it was embattled in the conflict of special interests, doubted and lost faith, have now become reimbued with a belief in the fundamental soundness of the program and are convinced of its success. Mr. William Randolph Hearst, who recently sailed for Europe, when asked his views on the National Recovery Act, stated—I quote from the Washington Herald of May 2:

> It is much better than it was. I talked with General Johnson in Washington, and he seemed to have a very judicious and admirable attitude. He said that the codes were very satisfactory to many industries and they preferred to have them rather than not to have them.
> I have sympathy for the National Recovery Act and all is right with it so long as they don't try to tell you to do something you cannot do.

Of business in general Mr. Hearst said:

> I should say that there is a very definite change, a distinct change. Our own business—newspapers—is a very good barometer. If it were not so, we could not carry out the provisions of the N.R.A. Advertising is increasing, and that is an indication of improved business.

This is no time for scoffers and cynics to smirk at the courageous efforts of a great people. This is no time to cast down and discredit the efforts of loyal and devoted public servants, who are helping that people to reestablish faith in itself and in its ability to throw off this nightmare of despondency. This is no time for enemies of our form of government to sabotage this great cooperative effort to advance their own selfish ends. This is the time to inquire into the motives back of this campaign of planned destruction of faith. I demand a complete investigation into the personnel and motives of the Darrow Review Board.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be advised what the N.R.A. has to do with this legislation.

Mr. TRUAX. Just about as much as the gentleman's own remarks. As a matter of fact, they have more to do with it because these are constructive utterances of mine and the gentleman's were destructive. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein statistics printed in the Cleveland Plain Dealer and in the New York papers as evidence of the success of N.R.A.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to talk on the bill. The President of the United States has asked Congress to pass this bill. He is asking for unified control of the great lines of communication. If there were anything I could add to this bill which would create a commission to handle and to supervise and investigate the communications of this country, it would be that something be done, and in the near future, to lower the rates of the telephone octopus of this country, to lower the rates of the Western Union, and the Postal Telegraph, and any other lines of similar service.

These public utilities are the only ones I know of, outside of the gas monopoly and the Power Trust, that all during this depression have not only refused to lower their rates, but have raised them, doubled, and trebled them.

We put a tax of 5 cents on telegrams. I do not know how it is in other States, but in my State, Ohio, the Western Union charges the consumer this 5-cent tax on a 25-cent telegram, while the Postal Telegraph Co. pays the tax itself. Surely the cost of operation of one telegraph line is no greater than that of the other. It is high time we had a thorough and complete investigation looking toward the lowering of rates of the telephone companies of this country, largely owned by J. P. Morgan & Co., of Wall Street. In my State this is true, because the Ohio Bell Telephone Co. is owned by Morgan & Co.

I understand that the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. is largely owned by Morgan and his band of pirates and buccaneers down in Wall Street. Think of it! When the price of farmers' hogs is only 3 cents a pound, eggs selling at 12 dozen cents a dozen; when in my State the farmers will not even have a garden; when they will have to cut their hay with a lawnmower or a safety razor; when they have nothing to sell—Mr. Wallace's program of crop reduction is working in my State at 100 percent, and the reason you have dollar wheat on the Chicago Board of Trade is that the farmers will not have any wheat to sell. High prices when he has nothing to sell and low prices when he has a bumper crop. This unfair condition, coupled with the pig-killing, plowing-under Wallace program is sending the farmer straight to an economic hell in a double-geared, super-streamlined hanging basket.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am not against the bill; but each time a radio bill has been before the House for the last several years I have expressed myself with this thought in mind: There ought to be some expression of policy from Congress for these boards set up to handle radio problems. If we do not set up a policy, are they expected to take the initiative?

We all know that in general we have to listen to what may be furnished by those who buy time to advertise their products.

The thought I have expressed here often is that we ought to have an investigation leading to an enlarged use of radio for use in sending messages similar to telephone and telegraph.

It would seem that when we are traveling or located where we may not have the use of the telephone we ought to have communication by the use of the radio. Perhaps it is not yet practical. Do we not telephone by radio across the seas? Why not telephone by radio between points in the United States? Some 2 years ago we received volumes from the Federal Trade Commission tending to show that radio was controlled by a monopoly which seemed to have agreed not to go into competition with telephone and telegraph companies. I am wondering if the committee paid any attention to these reports of the Trade Commission and ever discussed any policy suggested by these reports. Is this little statement in the bill that this new board will make a study sufficient? As before, will not complaints as to present allocations be their chief concern? Congress should determine the general policy of the use of this great invention, and the board should carry out such instructions.

I want to make the point clear as I can that we should know why the radio cannot be used for the more important matters of transmitting messages, news, and educational features. People in other countries seem to be willing to pay for service they receive, rather than surrender the air to advertisers who may be able to pay for such privilege. The board should study the way that it is carried on elsewhere and make recommendations. Congress itself should suggest to this new board a broad field of investigation in the radio field.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes. I am not going to attempt to discuss the bill in detail. Frankly, I do not know enough about it to do so, but I do want to take the opportunity to express my approval of the general purpose of the bill. For several years there has been an agitation to put all communications by wire and wireless under the jurisdiction of one commission. I think that is desirable, and that is what this bill primarily does. Speaking broadly, it does not attempt to do anything further than that. Under existing law the Postmaster General has certain powers over telegraph companies, the Interstate Commerce Commission has a great deal of power by statute over telegraph and telephone companies, which, for the most part, it has never exercised, and, of course, the Radio Commission has complete control under existing law over the radio. This bill proposes to put all of the powers now exercised by these different agencies under the new communications commission and it abolishes the authority which these other agencies now have in that respect. It abolishes the present Radio Commission. Primarily that is all this bill attempts to do. There are some amendments to the laws relating to telegraph and telephone and cable, but no amendments have been proposed to the radio law. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has felt it is not sufficiently informed and that there is not enough time remaining during this session of Congress to enable it to go into the various phases of existing law to justify it in recommending any substantial amendments to the law as it now stands. The bill provides that the new commission shall report back to Congress its findings on different matters and make such recommendations for amendments to the law as it thinks should be made. These can be taken up and considered more deliberately some other time than they can be at the close of a session of Congress such as we are in at the present time.

To repeat, I am in sympathy with the general purposes of this bill and shall vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further general debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this act—

(a) "Wire communication" or "communication by wire" means the transmission of writing, signs, signals, pictures, and sounds of all kinds by aid of wire, cable, or other like connection between the points of origin and reception of such transmission, including all instrumentalities, facilities, and services incidental to such transmission.

(b) "Radio communication" or "communication by radio" means the transmission by radio of writing, signs, signals, pictures, and sounds of all kinds, including all instrumentalities, facilities, and services incidental to such transmission.

(c) "Licensee" means the holder of a radio-station license granted under the Radio Act of 1927, as amended.

(d) "Transmission of energy by radio" or "radio transmission of energy" includes both such transmission and all instrumentalities, facilities, and services incidental to such transmission.

(e) "Interstate communication" or "interstate transmission" means communication or transmission (1) from any State, Territory, or possession of the United States (including the Philippine Islands and the Canal Zone), or from the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, possession of the United States (including the Philippine Islands and the Canal Zone), or to the District of Columbia; or (2) between points within the same Territory, or possession (except the Philippine Islands and the Canal Zone), or the District of Columbia; or (3) between points within the United States but through a foreign country if the point of origin and the point of reception are not in the same State.

(f) "Foreign communication" or "foreign transmission" means communication or transmission from or to any place in the United States to or from a foreign country, or between a station in the United States and a mobile station located outside the United States.

(g) "United States" means the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia, and the possessions of the United States, but does not include the Philippine Islands and the Canal Zone.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A few moments ago one of the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle spoke with reference to section (c), page 51, of the Senate bill, which was left out of the House bill. I am sure the gentleman spoke the sentiment of many Members on the Democratic side of the aisle. Many Members on the Republican side have spoken to me about this particular subsection, which reads as follows:

The commission shall study the proposal that Congress by statute allocate fixed percentages of radio-broadcasting percentages to particular types or kinds of nonprofit radio programs or to persons identified with particular types—

And so on. I understand that is not in the House bill but is in the Senate bill and that that matter could go to conference. There are many people, not only on both sides of the aisle in this House but in the country, who are anxious to have some consideration given to that. While I realize the specific 25 percent is stricken out, all that would do would be to have the commission study the matter and report back at a later date with some kind of findings. I just wanted to take 2 or 3 minutes to call attention to the fact that there are many Members on our side of the aisle as well as on the Democratic side of the aisle who are interested in this.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I am also interested in this subject, although I say frankly to the Committee that, with the present information I have, I am opposed to mandatory allocation of wave lengths by the commission. However, I do think that the conference committee would do a service to the country by considering the question of whether or not we ought to have consideration by the commission of this question, which is getting to be a very acute one, and on account of which Congress is receiving a great deal of pressure from various organizations, to force the commission to allocate certain specific parts of the radio facilities to various organizations.

As a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries I have had some opportunity to study this question. It is one that needs a great deal of study, because, when you get into the field of trying to allocate by law to various organizations, no matter how good their purpose may be, you find you are dealing with a very difficult question. In the religious field, for instance, you find many various forms of religious organizations that would like to participate in the radio facilities of the country; yet, as far as I have been able to see at this time, no radio station can operate under the American system without having sustaining programs. When they accept sustaining programs they enter the commercial field. For that reason I would not have favored the amendment of the Senator from New York, which was attempted to be put on this bill in the Senate. However, I hope the conferees will consider whether or not it will be helpful to have this new commission make a study and report to Congress along that line. I wish to commend the commitee for its work on this bill. In my opinion it is greatly improved as compared with the Senate draft.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 205. (a) Whenever, after full opportunity for hearing, upon a complaint or under an order for investigation and hearing made by the Commission on its own initiative, the Commission shall be of opinion that any charge, classification, regulation, or practice of any carrier or carriers is or will be in violation of any of the provisions of this act, the Commission is authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable charge or the maximum or minimum, or maximum and minimum, charge or charges to be thereafter observed, and what classification, regulation, or practice is or will be just, fair, and reasonable, to be thereafter followed, and to make an order that the carrier or carriers shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent that the Commission finds that the same does or will exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any charge other than the charge so prescribed, or in excess of the maximum or less than the minimum so prescribed, as the case may be, and shall adopt the classification and shall conform to and observe the regulation or practice so prescribed.

(b) Any carrier, any officer, representative, or agent of a carrier, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, or agent of either of them, who knowingly fails or neglects to obey any order made under the provisions of this section shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $1,000 for each offense. Every distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 126, at the end of line 8, add section (c): "No official of the Government or member of his family shall receive pay for speeches over the radio."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. The gentleman spoke on this awhile ago?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DISNEY). The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXTENSION OF LINES

SEC. 214. (a) No carrier shall undertake the construction of a new line or of an extension of any line, or shall acquire any line, or extension thereof, or shall engage in transmission over or by means of such additional or extended line, unless and until there shall first have been obtained from the Commission a certificate that the present or future public convenience and necessity require or will require the construction, or operation, or construction and operation, of such additional or extended line: Provided, That no such certificate shall be required under this section for the construction, acquisition, operation, or extension of (1) a line within a single State unless said line constitutes part of an additional interstate line, (2) local, branch, or terminal lines, (3) wires or cables added to existing pole lines or conduits or other structures constituting established routes, or (4) any lines acquired under section 221 of this act: Provided further, That the Commission may, upon appropriate request being made, authorize temporary or emergency service, or the supplementing of existing facilities, without regard to the provisions of this section.

(b) Upon receipt of an application for any such certificate the Commission shall cause notice thereof to be given to and a copy filed with the Governor of each State in which such additional or extended line is proposed to be constructed or operated, with the right to be heard as provided with respect to the hearing of complaints; and the Commission may require such published notice as it shall determine.

(c) The Commission shall have power to issue such certificate as prayed for, or to refuse to issue it, or to issue it for a portion or portions of a line, or extension thereof, described in the application, or for the partial exercise only of such right or privilege, and may attach to the issuance of the certificate such terms and conditions as in its judgment the public convenience and necessity may require. After issuance of such certificate, and not before, the carrier may, without securing approval other than such certificate, comply with the terms and conditions contained in or attached to the issuance of such certificate and proceed with the construction, acquisition, operation, or extension covered thereby. Any construction, acquisition, operation, or extension contrary to the provisions of this section may be enjoined by any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of the United States, the Commission, the State commission, any State affected, or any party in interest.

(d) The Commission may, after full opportunity for hearing, in a proceeding upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, authorize or require by order any carrier, party to such proceeding, to provide itself with adequate facilities for performing its service as a common carrier and to extend its line; but no such authorization or order shall be made unless the Commission finds, as to such extension, that it is reasonably required in the interest of public convenience and necessity, or as to such extension or facilities that the expense involved therein will not impair the ability of the carrier to perform its duty to the public. Any carrier which refuses or neglects to comply with any order of the Commission made in pursuance of this paragraph shall forfeit to the United States $100 for each day during which such refusal or neglect continues.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. Perhaps the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] can answer the question. I want to ask with reference to section 214. It seems to me that the way it is worded would prevent the construction of emergency lines, due to some flood or fire or something like that. There are many times a year when emergency lines must be erected. It seems to me the way this section is worded, the emergency construction of lines would be prevented.

Mr. MILLIGAN. If the gentleman will read page 134, he will notice it makes provision for just such a case as the gentleman has stated.

Mr. BACON. I simply ask the question to clear the matter up.

The Clerk read as follows:

INQUIRIES INTO MANAGEMENT

SEC. 218. The commission may inquire into the management of the business of all carriers subject to this act, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted and as to technical developments and improvements to the end that the benefits of new inventions and developments may be made available to the people of the United States. The commission may obtain from such carriers and from persons directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by, or under direct or indirect common control with, such carriers full and complete information necessary to enable the commission to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a further question. Does section 218 prevent a man who has made an invention from patenting that invention?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no.

Mr. BACON. It does not deprive him of any right that he may have as an inventor?

Mr. RAYBURN. None whatever.

Mr. BACON. In other words, the company can use any inventions that they might make?

Mr. RAYBURN. For the time the patent runs; yes.

Mr. BACON. No patent rights are taken away?

Mr. RAYBURN. None whatever.

Mr. BACON. From either the individual or the company?

Mr. RAYBURN. None whatever.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, supplementing what I said in my remarks on the rule in which I called attention to attempts to take off the air station WNBO at Washington, Pa., I want the House to know and understand something more about this particular instance, because it has to do with the question of censorship and the treatment that is being meted out to the little independent broadcasting stations in this country by the Radio Commission. It is the practice, apparently, of the Commission to deal in this question of censorship directly with the broadcasting station—and may I say the Commission have no authority in law on the subject of censorship—and if they are not successful in the case of these small stations, they file complaints against them for letting certain people broadcast over their facilities.

In this case Mr. Spriggs, who operates station WNBO, was the object of certain charges—foolish charges mostly—in regard to operations that were paid for and otherwise. He wanted to continue his operations when he found out the Commission were after him and began appealing to sources from which he thought he could get relief. He employed certain attorneys in this city. Not being successful, he sought political influence. He sought the assistance of Joseph F. Guffey, chairman of the Democratic State Committee in Pennsylvania. Mr. Guffey turned him over to his appointee in the Department of Justice, a Mr. Vann, and Mr. Lohnes, an attorney here, and they assured him that they would get the matter straightened out with the Commission. They undertook it and certain other attorneys in the city of Washington, D.C., were employed apparently to assist Mr. Spriggs. All of a sudden Mr. Spriggs found out that the attorneys here employed were working in the interests of Mr. Guffey, and that Mr. Guffey wanted this radio station for his own account for political broadcasting in Pennsylvania.

I have here the correspondence between Mr. Guffey and Mr. Spriggs, showing the activities of these attorneys and the attorneys to whom Mr. Guffey turned him over, showing the activities of Mr. Vann, of the Department of Justice, using political influence. Mr. Spriggs found himself being double-crossed in this respect, after having paid large and voluminous fees; and apparently the Radio Commission were cooperating fully with Mr. Guffey and his man Vann, of the Department of Justice, and Messrs. Lohnes and George Sutton, because Mr. Spriggs was finally told, within the last 30 days, that that which he wanted most of all, the continuance of the right to operate his station, had been taken away from him and was to be given to a station in Canton, Ohio.

I submit that such tactics should not be permitted to continue. Here is a letter from Mr. Joseph F. Guffey to Mr. Spriggs, written from the Mayflower Hotel, November 15, 1933, where Mr. Guffey was located, and was dealing with all matters of Pennsylvania patronage and matters pending before the departments of the new-deal administration. He wrote Mr. Spriggs as follows:

NOVEMBER 15, 1933.

DEAR MR. SPRIGGS: This will acknowledge receipt of your telegram of the 9th, regarding the application now pending before the Radio Commission for the licensing of radio station at Washington, Pa. I understand this case is now in good shape before the Commission and that it will receive early consideration. As you probably know, Mr. Vann, of the Department of Justice—has now returned after an absence caused by an automobile accident. I am asking him to keep in touch with this matter, and I will be glad to be of every possible help in connection therewith.

The appointee of Mr. Guffey—

Sincerely,

JOSEPH F. GUFFEY.

I would call your attention also to the fact that WNBO had made an application before the Commission, which was pending since 1930, to move its station to Monessen, the hub of five counties and the center of one and three-quarter millions of people. WNBO is the only independent broadcasting station in the cosmopolitan area of Pittsburgh. One can thus understand how Mr. Guffey, Mr. Farley, and their political associates were interested in controlling this particular station, a station which Mr. Spriggs did not wish to sell but wanted to continue to operate; and what a contemptible trick Mr. Guffey and his political associates were resorting to, and with the aid and cooperation of their political-controlled Radio Commission. I want to register my protest against such tyranny.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to point out that the original license to WNBO was granted February 19, 1927. The original license was granted at 15 watts and its place on the dial was 1,420 kilocycles. Their station is located at Silver Haven, near Washington, Pa., and within a radius of 25 miles reaches a population of a half a million at the present time.

In 1927 the wattage of the Pittsburgh broadcasting stations was as follows:

KDKA, a National Broadcasting station, Pittsburgh, 25,000 watts. This has been increased to 400,000 watts. This station is owned by the Westinghouse Co. and is leased to the National Broadcasting Co.

WCAE, at Pittsburgh, is owned by William Randolph Hearst and carries almost exclusively N.B.C. programs, was 500 watts and has been increased to 1,000 watts. This increase was granted by the Federal Radio Commission without even notice to WNBO, in violation of the rules and regulations of the Radio Commission.

KQV, owned by Sam Brennan, is used almost exclusively by Columbia Broadcasting Co., started with 500 watts, and remains 500 watts.

WJAS, Columbia Broadcasting Co., was 500 watts and was increased to 2,500 watts.

WWVA, Wheeling, W.Va., used almost exclusively by the Columbia Boadcasting Co., now has 5,000 watts, has an application pending to go to 10,000 watts.

WWSW, Pittsburgh, used almost exclusively by the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, owned by Paul Block (was originally Monessen and moved to Pittsburgh), started out with 100 watts and increased to 250 watts daytime and was again increased to 5,000 watts.

The station WWVA, of Wheeling, is in exactly the same status as WNBO. It has been increased from 250 watts to 5,000 watts, and this station was granted permission to move to Charlestown, W.Va., without notice to anybody. This move was restrained by a small station at Charleston by an injunction proceeding. Following the injunction granted, the Federal Radio Commission permitted WWVA to move to Moundsville, W.Va., its present location, without any notice to anyone. Notwithstanding the fact that WNBO had an application before the Commission since 1930, it could not get any favorable consideration by the Commission except through the employment of a prominent West Virginia politician who was paid a fee of $500. WNBO's increase from 15 watts to 100 watts was granted. The matter was handled by the West Virginia politician with Mr. Robinson, of the Federal Radio Commission, and George Sutton, of the Federal Radio Commission, who was at that time the technical adviser to the Commission.

In 1929 or early 1930 George Sutton resigned as technical adviser to the Commission and commenced practicing before the Commission. He then advised WNBO that he could increase their wattage to 250 watts and also could obtain permission for them to move to the Monongahela Valley for a fee of $750. This fee was paid to Sutton. Sutton then advised WNBO that it would be necessary to reequip the station completely with Western Electric equipment. This was done at a cost of approximately $10,000. The result of Sutton's effort and the reequipment was that WNBO at its hearing was taken completely off the air by the Radio Commission. This was June 1, 1932.

From that time up until the late summer of 1933 Mr. Spriggs was subjected to all kinds of trouble and punishment by the Commission. The 6 a.m. to 9 a.m. hours were taken from him; 12 to 3 p.m. were taken from him; 6 to 9 p.m. were taken from him. Hearings were set, witnesses proceeded to Washington, the cost of which exceeded the sum of $3,500. In May 1932 he applied to have his station moved to the Monongahela Valley, and a hearing was had in February 1933. This hearing was continued repeatedly. His application was refused.

The Radio Commission placed WNBO back on the air pursuant to pressure from approximately 200,000 supporters in the form of letters and telegrams directed to the Radio Commission and to the Congressmen and from various Congressmen and Senators.

When the Radio Commission did permit WNBO to go back on the air they divided their time with WHBC, Father Graham's station at Canton, Ohio—the other station I referred to. And this is another story which I will not at this time go into.

In 1933, in the late summer or early fall, at the testimonial dinner held in the William Penn Hotel in honor of Robert L. Vann, new appointee in the Department of Justice, sponsored by Joseph Guffey and attended by James Farley, Mr. Vann was introduced to Mr. Spriggs, of WNBO. Vann proposed to Spriggs that if WNBO would furnish several thousand dollars of advertising for the various candidates in whom he and Guffey were interested, that he and Guffey would have his station moved to the Monongahela Valley overnight and they would pay the legal expenses and increase their power to 1,000 watts. The expense to be covered was the legal expense and the actual expense of moving.

WNBO permitted the candidates endorsed by Vann and Guffey to speak over the radio and furnished approximately $2,000 of advertising. Guffey and Vann advised Spriggs that the nature of the broadcasting in favor of their candidates would be outlined to him by Charles B. Wagner, of Washington, Pa., who was the Democratic member of the Pennsylvania Legislature from Washington, Pa.

The net result of the radio-advertising deal made at this dinner, which was so agreeable then, as arranged between Vann, Guffey, and Farley and Spriggs, was that Mr. Spriggs was "double-crossed" and an attempt was made by Mr. Guffey and his associates to take over this station and ruin Mr. Spriggs by destroying the value of his broadcasting station, as it would be worthless without a license to operate, which license could only be secured through the Radio Commission.

When they found out that the facts in these cases were a matter available to the public they withdrew their activity, fearing that they might not be able under the circumstances to take Mr. Spriggs' station away from him and devote it to the use of the present campaign in Pennsylvania, which covers an area of some 12 counties.

The necessary money was to be furnished Mr. Guffey by his financial political sponsor from Pittsburgh and the only condition attached to the whole matter was that a microphone was to be attached to the sponsor's desk.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Guffey advised Mr. Spriggs, of WNBO, that Mr. Horace L. Lohnes, of Washington, D.C., would act as his counsel, whereupon a conference was held with the interested parties in Mr. Guffey's office in the Mayflower Hotel. I am advised that this meeting was attended by Messrs. Spriggs, Guffey, and various others and that frequently Mr. Guffey left the room to confer with Mr. Farley. Attorney Lohnes, when approached by Mr. Spriggs, stated that he accepted the case of WNBO as his client and told them he would handle the matter in accordance with the arrangements made by Mr. Guffy and Mr. Vann, and he then proceeded to file the application. Many conferences were held between the interested parties—Guffey, Vann, Spriggs, and the Pittsburgh friend.

Finally it was made known that the Radio Commission would not grant a renewal application to WNBO. And I call your particular attention to a letter written by Robert L. Vann, of the Department of Justice, August 4, 1933, as follows:

DEAR SPRIGGS: Write a letter to the Radio Commission at once asking a permit to withdraw application. Do this now. There is a reason. I'll see you Sunday or Monday.

ROBERT L. VANN.

It is a great advantage to have a lobbyist who is on the inside of a great governmental department, who has access to other departments like the Radio Commission; and in December 1933 Robert L. Vann advised Mr. Spriggs that he and Guffey had washed their hands of the whole matter and were going to support another application for facilities of WNBO.

On February 20, 1934, there was filed before the Radio Commission an application by the Tri-State Radio, Inc., a newly formed corporation, asking for the facilities of WNBO. I should like to point out to this House that this is the first time in the history of the Radio Commission, at least so far as is known, that any radio station or any other person has filed an application for the facilities of an existing station, and I also wish to point out the utter impossibility for such an application to have been filed without the Radio Commission having disclosed the fact that WNBO's license would not be renewed. I want to call to your attention the fact that the Radio Commission sent out a notice of a hearing on this application dated March 22, 1934, fixing the hearing date for May 3, 1934, in which WNBO was not named as a respondent and to whom no notice was mailed. And on April 3, 1934, the Radio Commission filed a complaint against WNBO and enclosed a copy of the application of the Tri-State Radio Co., Inc.

The application of the Tri-State Co., Inc., discloses that Charles B. Wagner is the president, and that one of Mr. Guffey's associates, Judge Stone, is a party in interest. State Senator Wagner was Mr. Guffey's agent to arrange the political broadcasts. It is interesting to note that the attorney for the applicant, the Tri-State Radio Co., Inc., was the same Mr. Lohnes, who accepted the fee in connection with the application to move WNBO to the Monongahela Valley, and that he is the same man who was the attorney designated for WNBO as representing the interests of Messrs. Guffey, Vann, and his other financial political party in Pittsburgh. Prior to this it was common talk in Washington, D.C., that the license of WNBO would not be renewed.

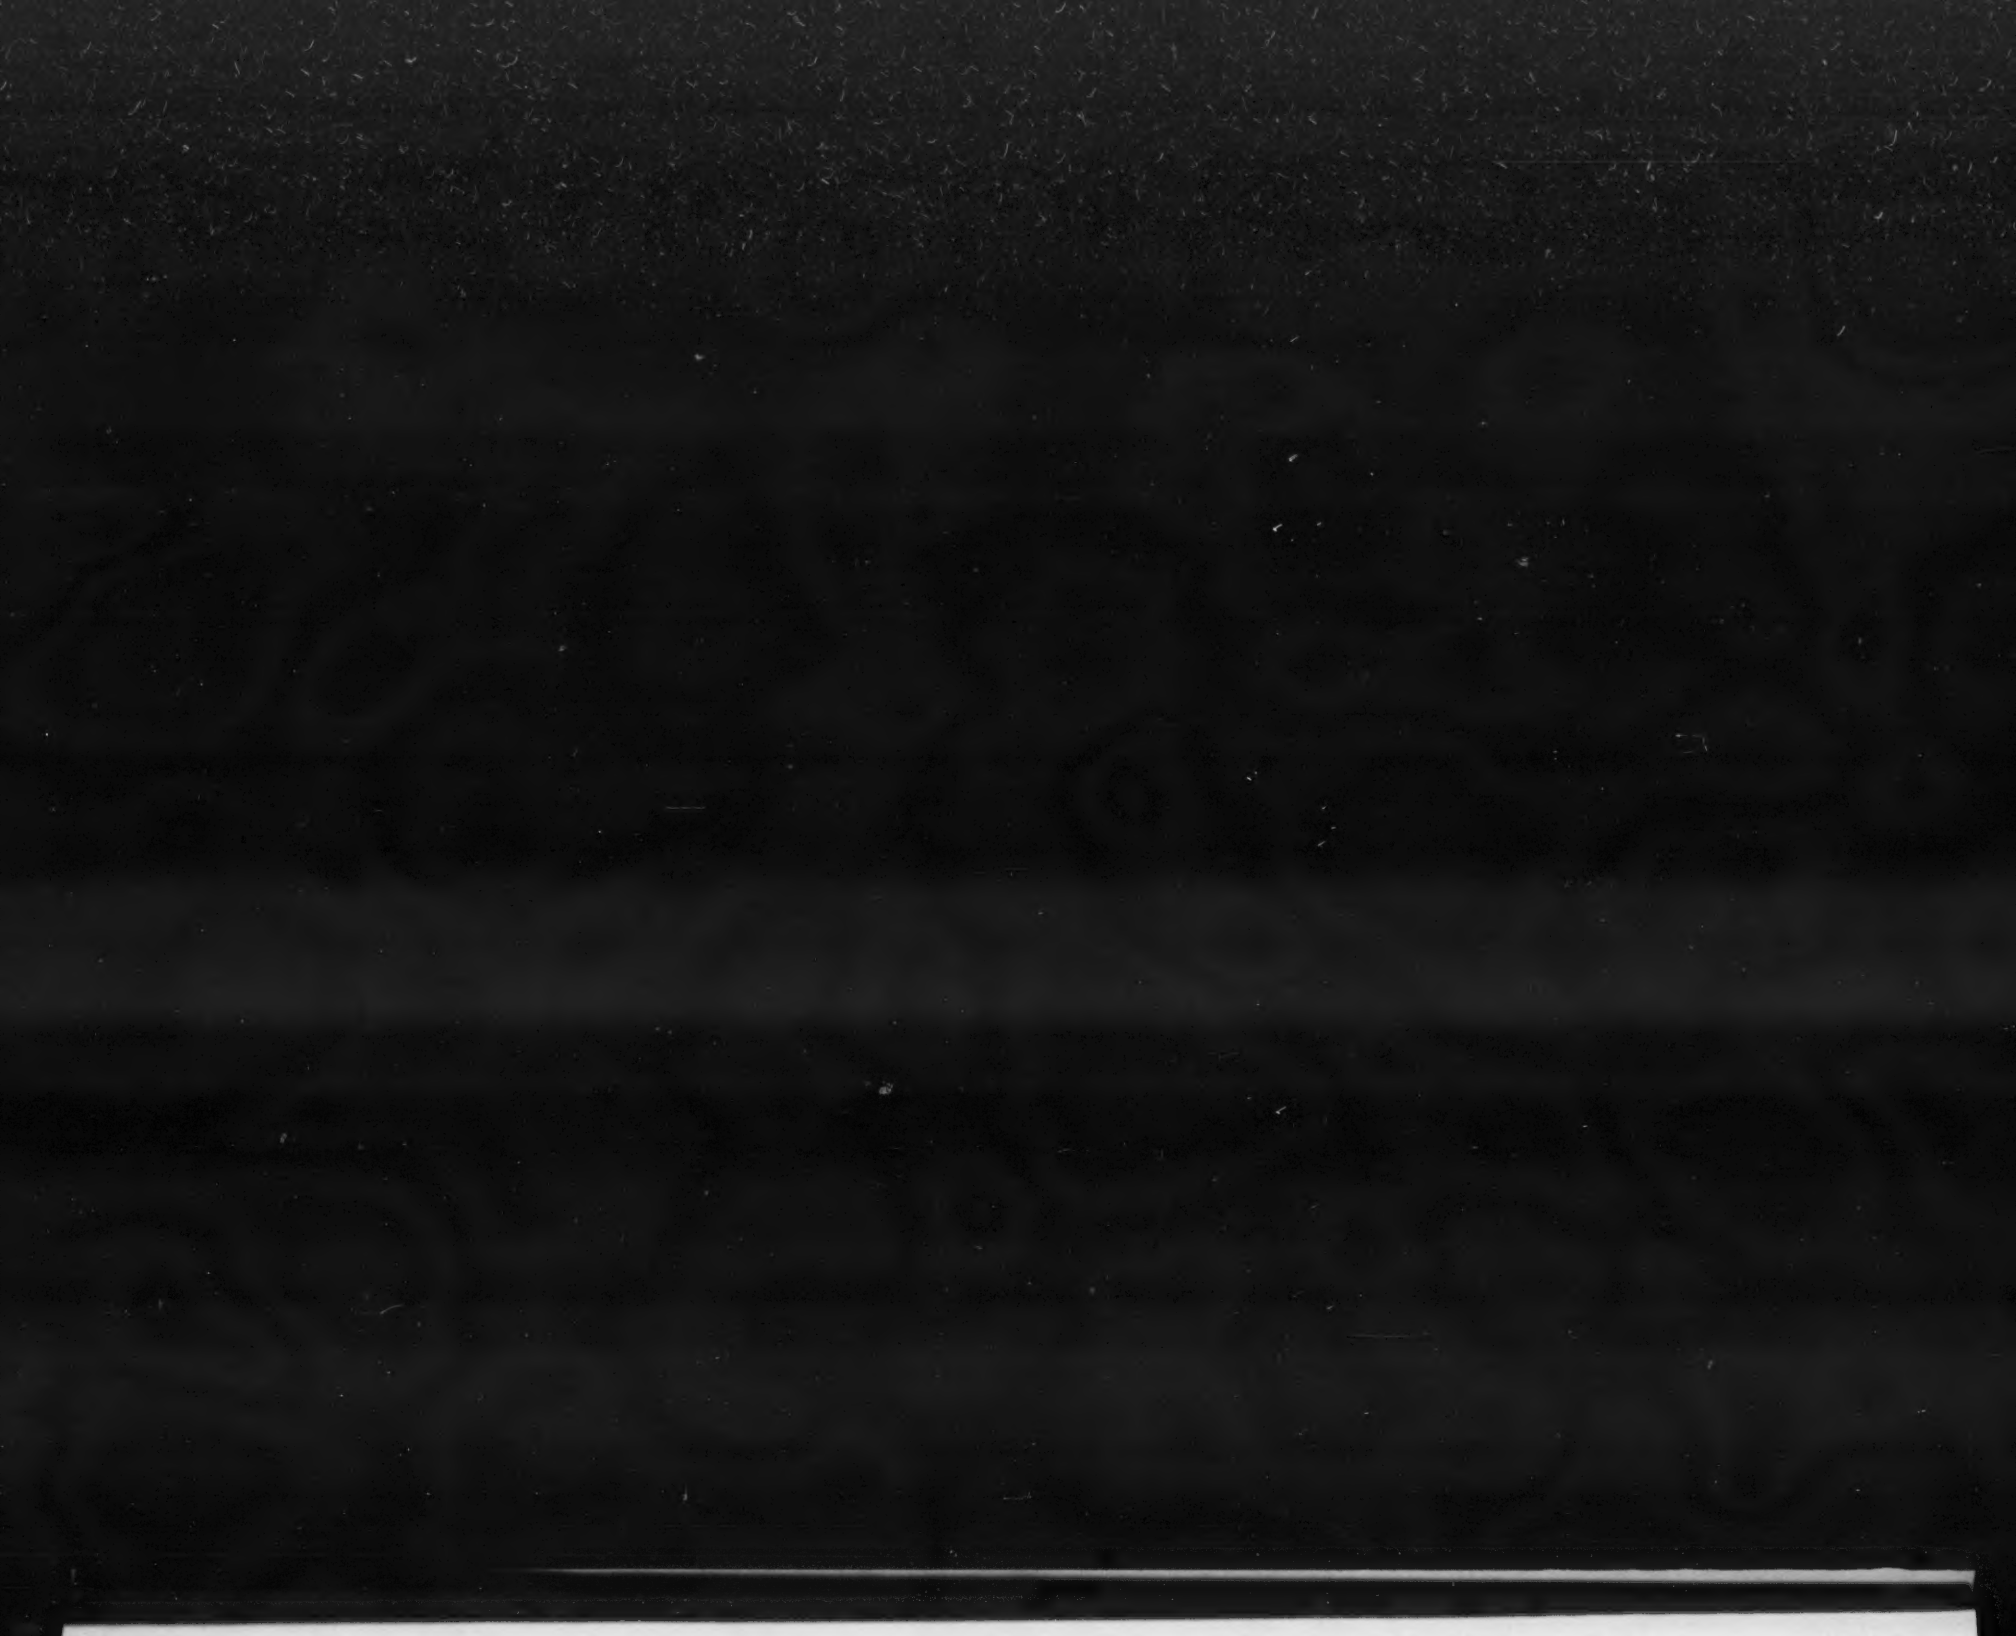
If this is a fair example of the plight of the average independent broadcaster in the United States, I submit that all independent broadcasting is on its way out, particularly if they are to be unprotected by the Commission that is established with an idea of protecting this industry and to see to it that each and every one gets a square deal.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TRUAX: On page 128, line 26, after the word "created", add "the Commission shall investigate the exclusion of addresses of Father Charles E. Coughlin and other crusaders against the international bankers and money kings by the National Broadcasting Co. and Columbia Broadcasting System."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane.



The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known fact that the addresses of one of the greatest crusaders for the common people in this country, the Reverend Father Charles E. Coughlin, have been barred by the National Broadcasting Co. and the Columbia Broadcasting System. Why? Simply because he reflects and makes certain charges against the very interests who have the monopoly of the broadcasting systems of this country.

Moreover, they will refuse to sell time to anyone who wishes to address the millions of listeners on old-age pensions. Why? Merely because that is a measure for the benefit of the common people of this country, the poor, the needy, the aged and distressed, against whom their master, J. P. Morgan, is eternally and unalterably opposed.

I want to call the attention of this House and the people of this Nation to the fact that these two major broadcasting companies are thus throttling such magnificent voices raised in behalf of the people in distress as, for instance, Father Coughlin, who has crusaded for months past to abandon the gold standard, for nationalization of the currency, and for such measures as the Frazier-Lemke bill to refinance the farmers of this country, and for the bank pay-off bill. I maintain that the throttling and strangling of this information from the millions of people of this country who are in distress and need aid, and need it now, is something that this Congress should not overlook.

You may strangle the daily press, you may strangle the weekly and the semiweekly publications; but when it comes to that point where we, the people, permit the millionaires of Wall Street to own and control the great systems of broadcasting that come to the ears of the poor man, the farmer, the wage earner, and all of these distressed, toiling millions so that they can hear only what their masters say they shall hear, it is time that this Congress took decisive action to make the air what it used to be and what it should be today, free for all the people. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO TELEPHONE COMPANIES

SEC. 221. (a) Upon application of one or more telephone companies for authority to consolidate their properties or a part thereof into a single company, or for authority for one or more such companies to acquire the whole or any part of the property of another telephone company or other telephone companies or the control thereof by the purchase of securities or by lease or in any other like manner, when such consolidated company would be subject to this act, the Commission shall fix a time and place for a public hearing upon such application and shall thereupon give reasonable notice in writing to the Governor of each of the States in which the physical property affected, or any part thereof, is situated, and to the State commission having jurisdiction over telephone companies, and to such other persons as it may deem advisable. After such public hearing, if the Commission finds that the proposed consolidation, acquisition, or control will be of advantage to the persons to whom service is to be rendered and in the public interest, it shall certify to that effect; and thereupon any act or acts of Congress making the proposed transaction unlawful shall not apply. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed as in anywise limiting or restricting the powers of the several States to control and regulate telephone companies.

(b) Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply, or to give the Commission jurisdiction, with respect to charges, classifications, practices, services, facilities, or regulations for or in connection with wire telephone exchange service, even though a portion of such exchange service constitutes interstate or foreign communication, in any case where such matters are subject to regulation by a State commission or by local governmental authority.

(c) For the purpose of administering this act as to carriers engaged in wire telephone communication, the Commission may classify the property of any such carrier used for wire telephone communication, and determine what property of said carrier shall be considered as used in interstate or foreign telephone toll service. Such classification shall be made after hearing, upon notice to the carrier, the State commission (or the Governor, if the State has no State commission) of any State in which the property of said carrier is located, and such other persons as the Commission may prescribe.

(d) In making a valuation of the property of any wire telephone carrier the Commission, after making the classification authorized in this section, may in its discretion value only that part of the property of such carrier determined to be used in interstate or foreign telephone toll service.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, the real depository of the liberties of the people is to be found in freedom of speech and freedom of the press. No lesser person than Thomas Jefferson, upon reading the Constitution, made the remark, in substance, that it did not make so much difference the form of government a people had so long as they had a free press; that with a free press a good government could not go far wrong, and with a free press a bad government could not long survive.

With the coming of radio it is not enough to have freedom of speech, which includes the right to stand upon a street corner and speak one's views. With radio there must be reasonable freedom of speech over the air, otherwise the benefits of freedom of speech have been taken away from the people.

I know of no way that radio can be operated except on the basis of a license from the Government, for the simple reason that there are not enough air channels to take care of all the radio stations that might want to operate. Therefore, there must be a limitation upon them.

When the Government has the power to issue licenses to operate radios it inherently follows that this Government agency has too great a control over freedom of speech. Whether the Radio Commission or any other Government agency turns it hand, the fact remains that throughout the years the broadcasting systems which are looking to the Radio Commission for courtesies are going to be found upon the side of the administration in power. So, after all, the real protection of the people yet rests in the freedom of the press rather than in freedom of speech since the coming of radio.

We have had a fair example of this since this administration came into power. I have no concrete evidence that this administration has laid down upon any radio station and said, "You must carry new-deal propaganda, and you must not carry anything to the contrary", yet the fact remains that radio broadcasters currying the favor of a Government agency, have given unlimited facilities to new-deal propaganda and have unwarrantedly denied the right of the air to those who would rise to criticize any part of the new-deal program.

I have no personal complaint. No Republican Member of Congress can have any personal complaint, so far as I know. It is my understanding that a Republican Member of Congress can get on the air whenever he wants to with either of the chains on any reasonable time or occasion, but there it stops. The ordinary private citizen who is a Republican cannot get on the air to discuss the other side of some of this so-called "new-deal" legislation.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. No; I cannot yield now. I will at the end of my remarks.

Former United States Senators who are Republicans have been denied the opportunity to appear upon the chains to discuss these public questions. I can say of my own personal knowledge that the Honorable James A. Reed, former United States Senator from Missouri, was denied the right of the air to discuss his views of the proceedings in the Wirt hearings. This was a denial of freedom of speech. A Republican Member of Congress—yes—could have had the air to discuss it if he had wanted to, but it is not enough that Members of Congress of the minority party or with minority views may have the benefit of the air. This right must be extended to other citizens. The very week that former Senator Reed was denied the opportunity to discuss over a national radio hook-up the treatment accorded to his client, there appeared upon that same network propaganda from private citizens who were denouncing and criticizing Dr. Wirt.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 more minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. In other words, private citizen James A. Reed was denied the opportunity to discuss one side of that question, while other private citizens had an opportunity to use the air to discuss the other side of the question. The only answer can be that those in charge of the radio facilities were either currying the favor of this administration in permitting private citizens to take the air to denounce Dr.

Wirt, or they were afraid of currying the disfavor of the administration if they permitted Senator Reed to speak over the air to criticize any of the "brain trusters."

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Not now.

There still remains the freedom of the press. The press carried this same subject matter openly, both sides of it, and carried the views of Senator Reed as well as the views of those who had contrary ideas.

So in conclusion I wish to say that with all the greatness of radio, the liberty of the people of this country yet rests in the press and not in the radio. I hope that at some time a plan may be devised whereby the use of the air will be free without censorship or discrimination.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a remark or two in reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] about this Wirt fiasco.

This platform for the work of investigation was laid in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. We were asked if we were going to call Dr. Wirt, and we said no; that he was a garrulous old man, and it was thought that he would not be very enlightening to the minds of the American people.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment to ask a few questions of the chairman of the committee, if he will be so kind as to answer them. On page 142 is a provision that "the Commission shall at all times have access to and the right of inspection and examination of all accounts, records, and memoranda", and so forth. That reminds me, and if I am wrong I trust the chairman will correct me, that it is the general procedure to incorporate such a provision in all legislation that creates or, for that matter, reorganizes the existing Commission from the standpoint of investigating books, records of that corporation.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true. That is in the Interstate Commerce Act. Section 20 gives that authority over common carriers.

Mr. WEARIN. That is my understanding. But they did not have that provision in the Stockyards Act of 1921. That does not give that authority. Now, there is one other question in reference to the bill from the standpoint of supervision that extends over radio stations: I presume that goes to all stations regardless of their size?

Mr. RAYBURN. If that is the law, it now remains in the bill, because we do not amend the Radio Act.

Mr. WEARIN. Now, with reference to the operation, does it affect the small mutual companies that operate within the States?

Mr. RAYBURN. They are not affected.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I do this in order to enlighten the House by quoting from a letter from Lucian A. Spriggs to Mr. Guffey, dated October 2, 1933:

> We are following and will continue to carry out Mr. Van's recommendations to the letter. Our contact with Attorney Horace L. Lohnes, Munsey Building, was made by Mr. Van prior to his accident. When we called to see Mr. Van at the hospital in Hagerstown he directed us to Attorney Lohnes (attorney for all important radio stations in the United States), who has interceded for us to the point where we now are. Mr. Lohnes informs us that every detail will meet with the approval of the Federal Radio Commission.
> Mr. Van has already contacted Chairman Eugene Sykes and James Hanley (Democratic members of the Commission) and Senator Patrick Harrison, Mississippi, all of whom are favorable.
> We understand that a decision will likely be handed down this week dealing with our station. With your help and that of other necessary persons the decision will be favorable and will be rendered before the end of this week.
> Every recommendation made by Attorney Lohnes is satisfactory to Mr. Van and to us. In spite of not having to move the station, the set-up, as now recommended, will give us better coverage over the 12 counties, with remote control in each of the counties and microphones in places that you suggest. It is even better than we had anticipated when the project was first brought to your attention. This new idea gives us the needed increase in wattage.
> Now the important thing is a favorable decision, and this week. We know you can get it.
> With sincerest appreciation for your continued interest.
> Yours very truly,
> LUCIAN A. SPRIGGS,

This letter indicates how completely Mr. Spriggs was carrying out his part of this political-broadcasting deal in order to get through Mr. Guffey, the Democrat politico major domo of Pennsylvania, that which should have been available, and would have been available had not the whole matter been messed up in the Federal Radio Commission by first one outfit and then another who wanted to take Spriggs' station away from him.

Apparently Mr. Spriggs had definite assurance from Mr. Guffey that his desire would be fulfilled. I now read a letter from Joseph F. Guffey, dated the Mayflower, Washington, D.C., which would seem to confirm this; it is dated November 15, 1933:

> DEAR MR. SPRIGGS: This will acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of November 9, regarding the application now pending before the Radio Commission for the licensing of a radio station at Washington, Pa.
> I understand that this case is now in good shape before the Commission and that it will receive early consideration.
> As you probably know, Mr. Van has not returned to Washington, after his absence on account of an automobile accident. I am asking him to keep in touch with this matter, and I will be glad to be of every possible help in connection therewith.
> Sincerely yours,
> JOSEPH F. GUFFEY.

I read now a telegram dated September 29, 1933, to Lucian A. Spriggs, Radio Station WMBO, Washington, Pa.:

> Certificate already filed with Commission along with other pertinent papers.
> HORACE L. LOHNES.

Also a telegram of October 9, 1931, from George O. Sutton to Spriggs:

> I will prepare all briefs, appearances, and notices to be submitted to Commission. Have you received formal notice of hearing? Forward this and all pertinent information to me immediately so I may acquaint myself fully. Am writing you with instructions as to information to gather.

These gentlemen at that time were cooperating with Mr. Spriggs because of the fact that they were making good use of his station in disseminating political information over the broadcasting station. I have already referred to the contract price in regard to that advertising. This became so effective apparently that they were not satisfied to let Spriggs continue to operate his own plant where they could get this advertising free, but they concluded it would be better for their interests to take over the station absolutely, and that is what has been taking place here, and the Radio Commission has been carrying out the suggestions in regard to the closing of the Washington station.

This matter was called to my attention in the following manner: Mr. Spriggs came to my office and told me of all the trouble he was having in connection with the operation of his radio station and explained to me in detail that which I have set forth in this discussion. At the time of his coming to my office he had been notified by the Commission that a hearing on his application for renewal of license was scheduled for May 8. The time was nearly up, and he and his attorneys, who later called at my office, asked me if I could not arrange a postponement of this hearing. This I tried to do with Judge Sykes, of the Radio Commission, and through the General Counsel's office, all of which was to no avail, as Mr. Spriggs was advised on April 23 by Mr. Herbert L. Pettey, secretary of the Commission, that his request for a continuance of the hearing on his application for renewal of license scheduled for May 8, 1934, had been denied, and that the hearing would take place as scheduled. What the final disposition of his case has been is not known to me at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDERS NOT FOR PAYMENT OF MONEY—WHEN EFFECTIVE

SEC. 408. Except as otherwise provided in this act, all orders of the Commission, other than orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time, not less than 30 days after service of the order, and shall continue in force until its further order, or for a specified period of time, according as shall be prescribed in the order, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission, or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so briefly to call to the attention of the Committee and those on both sides of the House who may be conferees on this bill, the importance of the reenactment of section 29, which is found on page 30 of the Radio Laws of the United States, a pamphlet, without number, that covers all radio enactments since the beginning. Section 29 is really the Magna Carta of the whole procedure and covers generally the complaints that have been made here today with regard to the freedom of the air. Section 29 provides:

That nothing in this act shall be understood or construed to give the licensing authority the power of censorship over radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, and no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the licensing authority which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication.

Of course, that section is in the law. It is complicated by the fact that under the law now a broadcasting station is liable for an action in slander and so it must necessarily have power, as a newspaper has to edit what appears in the newspaper, but this section, I am informed, is not in the Senate bill, but it is reenacted in the House bill; and I expressly commend it to the tender care of the House conferees on both sides of the aisle when the bill goes to conference. It is of the highest importance that this section should be retained in the law.

DOCUMENTS FILED TO BE PUBLIC RECORDS—USE IN PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 412. The copies of schedules of charges, classifications, and of all contracts, agreements, and arrangements between common carriers filed with the Commission as herein provided, and the statistics, tables, and figures contained in the annual or other reports of carriers and other persons made to the Commission as required under the provisions of this act shall be preserved as public records in the custody of the secretary of the Commission, and shall be received as prima facie evidence of what they purport to be for the purpose of investigations by the Commission and in all judicial proceedings; and copies of and extracts from any of said schedules, classifications, contracts, agreements, arrangements, or reports, made public records as aforesaid, certified by the secretary, under the Commission's seal, shall be received in evidence with like effect as the originals: Provided, That the Commission may, if the public interest will be served thereby, keep confidential any contract, agreement, or arrangement relating to foreign wire or radio communication when the publication of such contract, agreement, or arrangement would place American communication companies at a disadvantage in meeting the competition of foreign communication companies.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I ask unanimous consent to return to page 120 for the purpose of offering an amendment with respect to service charges.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to return to page 120 to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I shall have to object to going back to that page.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 414. Nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to refer briefly to the attack on the Tennessee Valley Authority made a few moments ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. His remarks, of course, were directed at the power policies of the Roosevelt administration—using the same arguments that are advanced by the Power Trust and its advocates from one end of this country to the other.

One of the greatest accomplishments of this administration—one of the greatest accomplishments of any administration in all the history of our country—is that of putting into effect the power policies of the Roosevelt administration through the instrumentality of the Tennessee Valley Authority, thereby giving to the American people electric lights and power at rates based upon the cost of production and distribution, and not upon the alleged values of watered stocks, exorbitant overhead charges, and expenses of maintaining holding companies and their subsidiaries—or based upon the helpless consumer's ability to pay. As I said on this floor once before, if President Roosevelt had never done anything else for the American people, this one act alone would be sufficient to carry his name down the centuries. It is one of the greatest achievements of modern times.

The hydroelectric power of this country is our greatest natural resource, outside of the soil from which we live. There is enough potential electric energy in our navigable streams now going to waste to supply all the needs of the American people. Heretofore this power has been used for the benefit of a favored few, and has been monopolized and so used as to maintain rates so high as to prevent its liberal use by the average individual or by the small enterprise.

When the Tennessee Valley Authority was created, something like a year ago, the President asked them to work out a "yardstick", showing a reasonable rate to be charged the ultimate consumers for electric light and power. That yardstick was worked out and the rates thereunder were applied in the first contract signed by the Tennessee Valley Authority with the city of Tupelo, Miss.

Those rates are as follows:

CITY OF TUPELO,
Tupelo, Miss.

Next 400,000 kilowatt-hours, per month, at 3 mills per kilowatt-hour.
Excess: Over 500,000 kilowatt-hours, per month, at 2.5 mills per kilowatt-hour.

It has been charged by the private power companies that these rates are below the cost of production of electric energy. That is not true; the T.V.A. took into consideration every element of cost involved. They even added an item for taxes which a private corporation would have to pay. They did this in order to be absolutely certain that they were not selling this power below the cost of production. These rates will be lowered in the years to come. They are higher than the rates in Canada, where they have had public ownership of power facilities for many years. They are higher than the rates in Tacoma, Wash., where they have had public ownership for many years; and, if private power companies will squeeze the water out of their stocks, get rid of useless holding companies, whose stocks as a rule are all water, and quit spending so much money for high-salaried officials, attorneys' fees paid to lawyers who are hired for political purposes, and stop their expensive propaganda through the newspapers, magazines, and otherwise, they can deliver electric energy to the American people anywhere in the United States at the T.V.A. rates.

The Tupelo contract went into effect on February 7, 1934. On that date the T.V.A. began to furnish electric energy to the city of Tupelo to be retailed at the yardstick rates. Up to that time we were paying the same exorbitant rates that were charged for electric energy throughout the country by the private power companies—the same unreasonable, unconscionable and exorbitant rates that are now being paid by the constituents of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

In order that Members of the House and everyone else who reads this RECORD may appreciate what this reduction in rates has meant to the ultimate consumer, I am going to read into the RECORD at this point duplicate power bills paid in Tupelo in the month of January under the old rates and then in the month of March under the new T.V.A. rates. In order that everyone who desires to do so may get first-hand information from the people referred to, I am going to insert the names of the consumers.

I will take the domestic consumer first, since he has been the most unjustly imposed upon in the past. He was the forgotten man until the Roosevelt administration came to his rescue. Let us see what has been done for him. I hold in my hand the power and light receipts of Mr. A. E. Berkley and others of Tupelo, Miss. In January Mr. Berkley used 24 kilowatt-hours of electric energy, at a cost of $2.40, under the old rates. In March he used 27 kilowatt-hours of electric energy, for which he paid 81 cents, under the T.V.A. rates.

F. M. Laney used 63 kilowatt-hours in January, for which he paid $4.02. In March he used 62 kilowatt-hours, for which he paid $1.74.

Let me read you a list of a few of the domestic consumers in Tupelo, showing the amount of electric energy used in January 1934 and the cost to them under the old rates, together with the amount used by the same consumers in March 1934 and the cost to them under the new T.V.A. rates.

I could fill pages of the RECORD with similar examples, but that is not necessary. These few are sufficient to show what the T.V.A. is doing for the domestic consumers of electric energy.

In addition to that, the Tennessee Valley Authority, through the Electric Home and Farm Authority, has made arrangements whereby home owners may secure electrical equipment, such as Frigidaires, electric ranges, washing machines, water pumps, water heaters, and so forth, at prices far below what they have been paying for these things, and may secure loans through the Electric Home and Farm Authority with which to pay for them. These loans are made on long terms and at low rates of interest. Thus, for the first time in history cheap electrical equipment and cheap electricity are both provided, and each helps to promote the more extensive use of the other.

Let me cite one example. I have before me a letter from a friend of mine in Tupelo, whom I have known for many years, in which he says:

> The people in this section are certainly crazy about the T.V.A. Before we put in our Frigidaire our ice bill ran around $9 to $12 a month and our electricity bill was from $7 to $10 a month, under the old rates. Now, we don't buy any ice at all, and last month (April) our electricity bill was only $2.38, a saving of $16 to $18 per month.

We are making a drive to take these benefits to all the people within the distribution radius of Muscle Shoals as early as possible. Not only the people in the towns and cities but the farmers, the people in the small villages, and out in the rural sections are to be served this cheap power and given the benefits of cheap electrical equipment through the Electric Home and Farm Authority. This will do more to brighten the farmer's home and make it pleasant and attractive, lighten the burdens of the farmer and his wife and children than any other one thing that has ever been done for him since farming began. It will help to keep people on the farm who are there now and will help to take our young people back to the farm.

I repeat, this is one of the greatest movements of modern times. It is merely the beginning of our drive to take cheap electric lights and power into every American home.

But it is charged by the power interests that under these rates we discriminate against commercial and industrial users in order to reduce the rates to the domestic consumer. Let us see about that. Here are the receipts of a few of the commercial consumers in Tupelo, showing the amount of electric energy used by them in January and the costs thereof under the old rates, and also the amount used in March and the costs thereof under the new rates.

These figures show that the merchant, the hotel keeper, the small business man, is also given the benefit of this cheap electric energy, thereby lightening his burden to a large extent.

But it has been asserted by the critics of the T.V.A. that industries are forced to pay higher rates, in order to make up for these low rates to domestic and commercial consumers. I also have before me some duplicate industrial receipts for the months of January and March. I will read one or two of them. Listen to this:

The McLeran Ice Cream Co., of Tupelo, consumed 1,680 kilowatt-hours during the month of January, for which it paid $92.19. In March, this same company consumed 2,080 kilowatt-hours, for which it paid $56.23.

Reed Bros, Inc., garment manufacturers, consumed 6,580 kilowatt-hours of electric energy during the month of January, for which it paid $210.25. In March they used 6,690 kilowatt-hours, for which they paid $145.38.

The Tupelo Cotton Mills, manufacturers of cotton cloth, consumed 204,803 kilowatt-hours of electric energy in January, at a cost of $3,181.33. In March they used 258,000 kilowatt-hours, for which they paid $1,896.40. They used 26 percent more power in March than they did in January, and yet their power bill was reduced 40 percent.

If this cotton mill had paid the same rates for power in March that it paid in January, this 258,000 kilowatt-hours would have cost $4,008. In other words, that cotton mill saved $2,112 on its March power bill. Spread that over 12 months, and, at that rate, this one small cotton mill would save $25,000 a year on its power alone.

These unquestioned facts and figures show what the American people would save on their electric light and power bills if we could only get electric energy furnished to them at rates based upon the cost of production and distribution.

This is just the beginning of a national policy which we hope and expect to pursue until we bring cheap electric light and power to every human being in America.

For my part I can truthfully say that my cup of gratification is literally running over. Passage of the Muscle Shoals bill was the culmination of a battle which I have helped to wage for more than 10 years. Members of the House know of the fight I made here for the passage of that bill a year ago. Today this cheap energy from Muscle Shoals is being supplied to the people in a majority of the counties of the district which I have the honor to represent, and we hope to have it supplied to the rest of them at an early date. So long as I live, whenever I see the twinkle of an electric light, especially in my section of the country, whether it be in the factory window, over the merchant's counter, or in the humblest farmer's home, I can say in my heart that I have helped to lighten that man's burden. In that respect, at least, I can feel that my public services have not been in vain.

The power development under this administration marks the dawning of a new day of hope and progress for the masses of the American people; and to think that the sunlight of this new era first broke over the district I represent and that its first benefits came to the people I serve and who have honored me with their suffrage brings to me a degree of satisfaction that has come to few public men on this earth.

This is not a temporary benefit to be enjoyed by a favored few. It is a lasting blessing, one that reaches every human being—the strong, the weak, the rich, the poor—and one that will be passed on down to our children and our children's children for a thousand years to come. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

LIMITATIONS AS TO ACTIONS

SEC. 415. (a) All actions at law by carriers for recovery of their lawful charges, or any part thereof, shall be begun within 1 year from the time the cause of action accrues, and not after.

(b) All complaints against carriers for the recovery of damages not based on overcharges shall be filed with the commission within 1 year from the time the cause of action accrues, and not after, subject to subsection (d) of this section.

(c) For recovery of overcharges action at law shall be begun or complaint filed with the commission against carriers within 1 year from the time the cause of action accrues, and not after, subject to subsection (d) of this section, except that if claim for the overcharge has been presented in writing to the carrier within the 1-year period of limitation said period shall be extended to include 1 year from the time notice in writing is given by the carrier to the claimant of disallowance of the claim, or any part or parts thereof, specified in the notice.

(d) If on or before expiration of the period of limitation in subsection (b) or (c) a carrier begins action under subsection (a) for recovery of lawful charges in respect of the same service, or, without beginning action, collects charges in respect of that service, said period of limitation shall be extended to include 90 days from the time such action is begun or such charges are collected by the carrier.

(e) The cause of action in respect of the transmission of a message shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to accrue upon delivery or tender of delivery thereof by the carrier, and not after.

(f) A petition for the enforcement of an order of the commission for the payment of money shall be filed in the district court or the State court within 1 year from the date of the order, and not after.

(g) The term "overcharges" as used in this section shall be deemed to mean charges for services in excess of those applicable thereto under the schedules of charges lawfully on file with the commission.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to be able to offer an amendment which would help this measure very much, and I am sorry that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLIGAN] has objected and cannot see fit to allow me to return to the particular paragraph to which it was applicable to offer it. This measure has been given a scientific reading and in this way the proper place for offering the amendment was passed. The amendment I had in mind was to be inserted at page 120, line 17. It was to this effect:

Provided, That no charge shall be made for installing telephone equipment.

I know and you know that the telephone companies make unreasonable "service charges" for installing telephone equipment. Take the telephone company here in the District of Columbia. They make a charge of $3 for the installation of telephone equipment, even though that telephone is already installed in your home or apartment, and the only thing remaining to be done is to connect it at the board.

To move a telephone within your home a charge of $1.50 additional is made. Charges such as that should be eliminated; they should not be permitted. As long as we sit idly by and permit these utilities to make such additional service charges, they will continue to make them. It ought not to be permitted. I feel it is our duty to stop such a racket as this. The monthly rental should be and is ample to take care of all incidental expenses, and these additional service charges just add to their large profits, and such charges should be stopped.

The telephone rates here in the District of Columbia are unreasonably high. The press recently carried a notice that there are more telephones according to population here in the District of Columbia than in any other city in the United States except possibly San Francisco. Such a record is no doubt due to the large Government pay roll made here in Washington.

Their profits, as shown by the press, are unreasonably high. They ought to reduce their rates. They certainly ought not to be allowed to continue to make these service charges. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

EFFECTIVE DATE OF ACT

SEC. 607. This act shall take effect upon the organization of the commission, except that this section and sections 1 and 4 shall take effect upon the enactment of this act. The commission shall be deemed to be organized upon such date as three members of the commission have taken office.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 175, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "upon the enactment of this act" and insert in lieu thereof the words "July 1, 1934"; in line 6, strike out "three" and insert "four."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion occurs on the committee substitute for the Senate bill.

The committee substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DISNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3285) to provide for the regulation of interstate and foreign communications by wire or radio, and for other purposes; and pursuant to House Resolution 411, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The substitute amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion by Mr. RAYBURN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House insist upon its amendment to the Senate bill and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, just on the question of orderly procedure, for the first time since I have been here that was done in the Senate the other day on an appropriation bill, where the Senate, not knowing what the House was going to do, took it for granted the House was going to disagree, and asked for a conference before the House had seen the Senate amendments. This is carrying out that same kind of new procedure.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know the Senate will disagree.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman of our House committee criticized the Senate the other day for doing that very thing. Now we come along and do the same thing. However, they set the precedent.

Mr. RAYBURN. We just gain a day or two. That is all.

Mr. BLANTON. The Senate set the precedent, so it cannot complain.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. RAYBURN, HUDDLESTON, LEA of California, MAPES, and WOLVERTON.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL—1935

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H.R. 9830, Rept. No. 1879) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental general and emergency appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1934, and June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. BACON reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to state to the Members that a copy of the hearings, a copy of the bill, and a copy of the report are available in the Appropriations Committee room, and any Member who wants them can get them. The bill will be called up Monday.

APPREHENSION OF PERSONS CHARGED WITH CRIME

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 9370) to authorize an appropriation of money to facilitate the apprehension of certain persons charged with crime, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "capture, dead or alive," and insert "capture."

Page 1, lines 7, 8, and 9, strike out "who is designated by the Attorney General of the United States as a public enemy."

Page 2, lines 4, 5, and 6, strike out "who has been designated by the Attorney General of the United States as a public enemy."

Page 2, line 17, strike out all after "United States" down to and including "violence" in line 21.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, this morning I asked unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in regard to Captain Hobson. I wish to insert a little poem by Eugene Ware. I did not want to do it without asking permission. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent to include in my extension of remarks the poem with reference to Captain Hobson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER]?

There was no objection.

REPUBLICAN REACTION

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting a radio address delivered by myself last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me, I am extending my remarks by inserting the following address delivered by me from Station WJSV, Washington, Friday evening, June 1, 1934:

REPUBLICAN REACTION

The second session of the Seventy-third Congress is soon to adjourn. It appears improbable there will be another session before the biennial elections in November, at which time the entire Membership of the next House of Representatives and approximately one-third of the Membership of the United States Senate will be selected. So far as legislative action of this Congress is concerned, the record soon will be completed for the biennial accounting at the polls in November. But, because of the confusion of the scene now presented, only time will tell the effects of the legislation enacted. Notwithstanding the speed with which the administration has proceeded to exercise the vast and unusual powers granted to it in pursuance of its new-deal policies, not one of these policies may be said to have passed beyond the experimental stage. There is such growing uncertainty and confusion, it now seems certain that in the fall campaign, to a very unusual extent in a non-Presidential election year, national issues will engross the attention of the electorate.

This is as it should be. No other administration in the history of the country has asked such unlimited powers or has been given so wide a latitude to try out its policies. No other administration has launched such a multiplicity of experiments so entirely new to our system of government or, in the opinion of many, so utterly incompatible with its spirit and form.

No other administration in the whole history of our Government has launched any program at so stupendous a cost—has poured out so lavishly, so casually for any purpose whatever, such staggering sums as are now being expended by this administration to see if its new deal will work. It is true that these tremendous outlays have been made in the name and presumable interest of the American people, but let it not be forgotten that the people themselves will eventually and inevitably pay the bill.

The confusion in which we now find ourselves—the mounting uncertainty regarding the outcome of this stupendous gamble on futures, worthy the spirit of 1929 before the crash—in short, the where-do-we-go-from-here mood of our people now everywhere in evidence makes imperative the need of the fullest possible discussion of the wisdom, or the lack of it, which has motivated those responsible for the situation, quite aside from any question of their motives.

As pointed out by Mr. Frank Kent in one of his recent articles in the Baltimore Sun, we now seem to be entering the "era of realities." Commenting on events leading up to this situation Mr. Kent said:

"The chief reason the country has been swung so much farther by the new deal than anyone ever dreamed we would go is because there was no effective group or person to put on the brakes. The acuteness of the emergency gained for the administration at the start almost solid press, public, and political support.

"Add to that the combination of propaganda and Presidential popularity, and the whole program was made irresistible. With no one grasping their full implications, a series of great regulatory schemes, not one of which has been thought through, going in different directions and some sharply clashing with others, was launched with bewildering rapidity. Men who disbelieved or doubted were overwhelmed. It was unpatriotic to oppose."

Again and again Mr. Kent has commented on the growing, the "terrific confusion"—to use his exact phrase—of the new deal. In his graphic way—in his capacity as a reporter of the national scene—he has told of his inability to find anyone with a coherent and comprehensive view of the whole plan, if plan it may be called, under the circumstances. It would seem that the national planners would have a plan that could be explained to so keen an observer as Mr. Kent, and to other eminent observers who have watched developments with fascinated interest, and now join in the demand that stock should be taken of the whole nebulous scheme.

It may be urged that there should be no party activity at this time, that the administration should be allowed to proceed unchallenged on its unchartered course, for good or ill, in the blind hope that someway, somehow, it will lead us out of the wilderness of doubts and fears in which we now find ourselves, and into prosperity and plenty. The time is past for such a course in view of the situation. Those who hold this view should be reminded that the price of liberty is eternal vigilance. The citizens of this country have a duty to perform as well as their chosen representatives. The heedless should "stop, look, and listen." The thoughtful should take stock of what has been going on. They should make a searching analysis of the new deal, the theories of the new dealers, and of all who stand for national office in November.

In the brief time allotted to me I cannot attempt to discuss in detail that maze of new-deal legislation which has been enacted and what may be the results of its application. The forces in charge of the affairs of the Government at this time have been moving so erratically, their destination is so uncertain, if, indeed, they have one definitely in mind, that a prophet would be at a loss to foretell where they will be next month, next week, or tomorrow, for that matter. Like dancers in the mazes of an old-fashioned quadrille, they move to the right, then to the left, then to the center. But they never remain long in one place. Much of the time they are swinging in circles. The difference is there was a pattern in the dance, whereas there seems to be none in the evolutions of the "new dealers."

I speak of an administration that has frankly announced its major policies are experimental—that if they do not prove satisfactory it will try something else. Where may be found the mandate for such a gamble with the destiny of a whole people? The stake is too vast for such a doubtful and unauthorized venture. Statesmanship demands courage—not rashness.

Candid Democrats, in Congress and out, freely admit there is nothing in the new-deal philosophy that remotely resembles original Democratic doctrines. A very distinguished Democrat, Senator CARTER GLASS, has not hesitated to denounce it roundly. In a recent interview he is quoted as saying:

"The new deal, taken all in all, is not only a mistake; it is a disgrace to the Nation, and the time is not far distant when we shall be ashamed of having wandered so far from the dictates of common sense and common honesty."

The promise of a new deal in the last campaign carried with it no implication whatever of the sweeping changes that were to follow so soon after the inauguration of the new administration. Neither was the new deal, as now developed, remotely implied in the last national Democratic platform. If words mean anything, quite the contrary.

The single paragraph declaring for rigid governmental economy is so utterly incompatible with the rash extravagance of the new deal that it proves the point. The platform declaration for "the removal of Government from all fields of private enterprise", comports little with that partnership between Government and business authoritatively enunciated not long ago as a principle of the new deal, and now widely in evidence as the order of the day.

It is generally regarded, I appreciate, a waste of words to discuss broken platform pledges under present conditions. The new deal seems to have brought with it a new code of political morals as well as the codes imposed upon business. But broken platform pledges will be a proper topic for discussion in the coming campaign, and well they should be. I say again, there was no mandate in the 1932 election, decisive though it was, for so rash an adventure into a field purely experimental, at a cost so great, involving such potentialities for evil to the form and spirit of our institutions.

There was no mandate to the legislative branch of the Government to delegate to the executive branch, as it has done, powers vested in it, and in it alone, by the Constitution. The representatives of a free people cease to be representative under such a system, and the people cease to be free.

The fundamental principles of our Government will be destroyed if present tendencies are not checked, no less surely than if a dictator were to be placed at its head by force of arms.

I speak with the conviction that a study of its principles, training in its ranks, and association with its membership bring to me when I say the Republican Party, in the face of all odds, will fight in the fall campaign to send Representatives to Congress who will oppose the tendencies of which I speak. The Republican Party's principles are broad enough to meet new conditions with new methods. They always have been. But while our party remains worthy of its name and true to its traditions it will have certain tenets from which it will not depart.

The Republican Party from its birth has been opposed to bureaucratic government. The Democratic Party under its long line of leadership, up to the advent of the present administration, denounced all tendency toward such a system of government. Bureaucratic government has been denounced in vigorous and picturesque language by statesmen whose utterances for centuries have led the thought of the world. In varied phrases it has been declared to be the worst form of government that could torture and afflict mankind. But I do not inveigh merely against a tendency in this country toward a bureaucratic form of government. We have one now—brought to us by the "new deal."

Fed on fabulous sums of the people's money, this bureaucracy has grown with astonishing rapidity. In its various branches and activities it has regimented the farmer, disturbed labor, placed impossible restrictions on business, and increased the cost of living without the compensating increase in purchasing power promised so profusely by its misguided sponsors. In short, it has meddled to no good purpose, so far as results have shown, in everyone's private affairs, after the manner and fashion of all bureaucracies of all time. Made desperate by the futility of their effort, its sponsors, if not checked, inevitably will demand more and more power and undertake more and more experiments.

Republicans regard such a system of government as pernicious, undemocratic, and un-American—not justified by any emergency, past or present—and will fight to rid the country of it with all the vigor at their command.

The Republican Party still believes in a government of laws and not of men. It cannot subscribe to the fallacy now all too prevalent that any emergency can justify the substitution for constitutional government of government by slogans, labels, experiments, and personal whims. It has not been converted to the view that governmental economies, pledged by both parties in 1932 and desired by all at that time, have ceased to be desirable. Nor has it come to believe with the "new dealers" that we should spend before we earn—that we can borrow and squander ourselves into prosperity.

Republicans appreciate that under complex economic conditions of modern times more government is required than in Jefferson's day, when he announced the principle long subscribed to by men of both parties that "that government is best which governs least." But they would not reverse the dictum. They cannot now subscribe to the view that that government is best which governs most.

They cannot bring themselves to believe that the advent of the new deal put in reverse the most fundamental truths woven into the fabric and spirit of our institutions. They would change the instrumentalities of government as needed to conform to new conditions, but never in the process would they undermine the solid foundation on which the whole structure rests. They still cling to the ideal of individual liberty—call it "rugged individualism" if you will, either in praise or derision. They still believe in a sound money system, in the "bill of rights", and the inviolability of all guaranties under the Constitution.

Most of all, they believe in a representative form of government, as provided for in the Constitution, with its checks and balances between legislative, executive, and judicial branches, and all that the term implies. They do not want it changed to any other form by direction or indirection, by intention or tendency. In the campaign to come they will endeavor to send men to represent them in the legislative branch of the National Government who hold to this view and will remain steadfast in this faith.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DEROUEN for 4 days, beginning Monday, on account of important business.

HOUR OF MEETING

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

NEPOTISM

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that it is late in the evening and that the House does not want to be detained.

Early in the Seventy-second Congress and likewise at the beginning of the Seventy-third Congress I introduced a resolution which I think should have the serious consideration of my colleagues in this body. It is H.R. 1684, a bill to prevent the practice of nepotism.

I hope I may have the opportunity a little later to be more fully heard with reference to this particular measure. I know it possesses merit. I respect each and every Member of this great Assembly. I know it is incumbent upon the Members of Congress to set an example, not only for the Federal Government but for State governments and for municipal governments.

Nepotism is defined as a system or custom practiced by several of the earlier popes of granting high honors, dignities, offices, pensions, and the like, to their family relatives, generally their nephews; hence, family favoritism of any sort.

Webster's International Dictionary defines nepotism:

1. Favoritism shown to nephews and other relatives; bestowal of patronage by reason of relationship, rather than merit.
2. Excessive fondness for one's nephews.

Thomas Jefferson said:

The public will never be made to believe that an appointment of a relative is made on the ground of merit alone, uninfluenced by family views; nor can they ever see with approbation offices, the disposal of which they intrust to their President for public purposes, divided out as family property.

Woodrow Wilson refused to appoint his brother to a Federal position. I am glad that Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, while First Assistant Postmaster General, now a United States Senator, ordered all third-class postmasters to discontinue employment of members of their family, effective May 1, 1933. This affected 10,500 post offices in America. Postmasters were ordered to select unemployed and unrelated who were competent and deserving, and those having dependents being given preference who were out of work.

I am indebted to Raymond Clapper, of the Washington Post, for most helpful suggestions in this discussion, taken from his most excellent publication, entitled "Racketeering in Washington", and also to the Universal News Service, the Associated Press, United Press, and International News Service for their loyal cooperation and support.

Congress should not surrender its powers. The "new deal" must not expect republican form of government in the United States to be abandoned. It is true many nations of the earth adopt a one-man government. This must not be in the United States. We have sacrificed too much in blood and treasure through our forefathers to permit government of, for, and by the people to perish.

Mussolini rules Italy. Russia is governed by a group of Communist Party leaders. Japan by a military junta. England by a few able men in Parliament, who are responsible for Great Britain's Government. Germany is controlled and governed by Hitler.

Apparently representative government and legislative branches of government have weakened, and the people have lost confidence in their leadership. Public confidence must be restored in legislative bodies. Congress itself has been in bad repute.

Since the administration of President Roosevelt began conditions growing out of the depression have demanded broad Executive powers, largely because the Congress had ceased to function for the people.

We are now going through an economic and peace-time revolution. Many experiments in government are taking place. Many untried fields are being explored. Many economists have been substituted for politicians. All the people and their businesses are interested in Washington. Decisions are daily made here which affect the lives, occupations, and incomes of 125,000,000 people. This is a big responsibility.

Congress and the President must, therefore, be above suspicion. This is no time or place to pad the family pay roll. It is no time to hire relatives and the next of kin. Too many out of employment in America for this. The people honor the Membership here by voting for and sending them to Capitol Hill as their spokesmen and representatives. It is no time or place for selfishness and greed.

We must have clean men in office. We must have honest men in office. We must have unselfish men in office.

The future of our national life is at stake. We must have a high standard of public service.

We must return from the road of bankruptcy to one of solvency and security. Expenses must cease to go up while revenues go down. The people must be employed with a proper wage scale. The taxpayers must no longer be crucified. The idle relatives must not longer remain on Government pay rolls. Savings for the taxpayers must be had. The sons-in-law, daughters-in-law, and all the other in-laws, and the wives, sons, and daughters should not be on the pay roll. Even if they do the work they are supposed to do, it sets a bad example over the country for the State, county, and municipal governments. Many States, like Oklahoma and Missouri, have constitutions that provide against the employment and appointment of the next of kin of the appointing power.

Men sent here are public servants. They represent the people. No reason exists for Government-paid chauffeurs, private elevators, nor private dining rooms, in which a Member of the House or the Senate may take his personal guests and next of kin to eat food served by waiters who are paid by the taxpayers of America.

The people who elect and send us here have no such comfortable and palatial surroundings. Why should their representatives become so much preferred over those who pay the bill? This should not be the case. The Members of both branches of Congress will profit by keeping in close touch with the people. No stream should undertake to rise above its source.

We will not deserve, nor will we have, the confidence of the people as long as Members at either end of the Capitol have their relatives on the pay roll, and who, at the time, are often many miles away from their work. We will not merit public confidence if this is continued. We will not have public respect unless we deserve it.

We get in life that to which we are entitled. Not only Congress but the departments of government are filled with those guilty of nepotism. Many wives, sons, and daughters are employed by some department head not because of merit but because of family relationship. It is indirectly obtaining money by means of false pretense. It is a crime against the taxpayers. It is a crime against America. It is selfishness and greed that resembles the practices of the rulers of the Dark Ages. It is modeled after the so-called "divine right of kings."

Many underpaid clerks are forced to do the work of some wife or daughter or son of a Member, who receives most of the pay, and the clerk who does the real work gets a starvation wage. Shame on a practice of this kind. It is graft of the rankest kind to put the next of kin on the pay roll as a clerk in the Member's office at a salary of $3,900 per year, when he or she does not come to the office once a month, but, instead, employs a stenographer at $50 or $60 per month to do his or her work, while the difference is kept in the family purse. This is robbing the taxpayers to that extent, and in the amount represented by the steal.

It is a disgrace. Millions are still unemployed, hungry, and walking the streets and highways while Congressmen pad their own salaries by the practice of nepotism and take the allowance provided for them to themselves for clerk hire and put it in their own pockets or send their children to school on the proceeds, or the wife enters so-called "society" in the Nation's Capital and entertains at the expense of the people back home. No wonder Congress has suffered in the estimation of the people. The Members of both branches here are guilty of this nefarious practice. They seek to outlaw and belittle anyone who may arise to protest this practice of greed, graft, and selfishness. It is necessary that the practice be clothed in secrecy and kept in darkness.

Those guilty meet in cloakrooms and secret conferences to console each other and seek a way to justify the graft on the basis that they are worth to their people and district more than the salary allowed. Wonder if they would advise their constituents back home that they are getting extra pay in this way?

> Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As to be hated needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

The public have rights. The people are entitled to know. Through the bill introduced by me in the Seventy-second and Seventy-third Congresses the Clerk of the House was forced to reveal how the public money was being spent by the Members. The records are now open for inspection, and, to the discredit of the present Membership, many names appear on the Clerk's rolls during the Seventy-third Congress as related to the Members.

It was impossible for a long time to know from the Clerk's report who was a Member's secretary.

The bill I have introduced and which is now pending before the Committee on Accounts is no. 1684.

By its provisions a Member cannot employ any of his relatives within the third degree.

It also makes it unlawful for a Representative or Senator to employ the relatives of other Members. I hope all those who want clean government will help in my efforts to have this bill favorably reported by the Committee on Accounts to the floor for passage this session.

It is no excuse or justification that the Vice President and the Speaker of the House have their wives employed as clerks on the pay roll. At the last session of Congress more than 133 Members were guilty. At this session about 65 Members still practice it. The Members in the other Chamber are more guilty of this practice. Thirty-seven out of the ninety-six total in that body are guilty, or were, in the last Congress.

No Member will keep down appropriations in other departments of Government where his next of kin are employed or benefited by his actions. He handicaps himself by his own wrong. It is not only a financial loss to the taxpayers, but a moral loss to the Member. It costs him much in his own self-respect, to say nothing of the lack of confidence and esteem which he suffers by those who look to Washington for an example in good government. Let us right this wrong.

Every Member of the House is allowed $5,000 for clerk hire per year. The Representative may divide this between two employees, but he is restricted in that he can only pay $3,900 a year to any one employee—the remainder to the second clerk. The chairmen of committees are allowed extra clerks.

Senators are allowed $10,320 per year for clerk hire, which they must divide among four clerks at salaries ranging from $3,900 down to $1,800 a year. Committee chairmen in the Senate are allowed one extra clerk and often more.

Mileage of 15 cents per mile each way to cover cost of travel of Members in both branches should be eliminated altogether. In the House this costs $175,000. With good roads and automobiles we can now easily and inexpensively come to Washington from all parts of the country. It is no longer expensive to travel. The present mileage rate was fixed in 1866 and was not reduced until last year, from 20 to 15 cents per mile.

It does not cost as much to travel now as it did when the rate was fixed before the automobiles and the pikes. We are not entitled to mileage and it should not be allowed. As a matter of economy and saving to the taxpayers mileage should be discontinued.

The Members of the other Chamber force the taxpayers to pay for their shaves and haircuts, their marble baths with professional rubbers, a pool of filtered water, violet-ray lamps, rowing and weighing machines; also many different kinds of mineral waters, free transportation from office to Senate, and free garage service in the new Senate garage. Each Member who dies in office has the expense of the funeral borne by the taxpayers and the casket expense included, which must not exceed $400. The widow of the Member is paid a salary of $10,000 for the next year, and the deceased Member's clerk is paid for 1 month, and his estate gets the balance of the stationery allowance unexpended.

I have introduced a resolution which, if adopted by the House, will stop all this in the future.

Members of Congress have the use of free mail, or the franking privilege on Government business from the day of their election.

Farmers, who pay the taxes to support their Representatives in luxury, have a right to rebel at this condition.

The Senate, for the year ending June 30, 1933, spent over $3,000,000 for its own operations and personnel.

The House, with 435 Members, spent over $8,000,000; the Architect of the Capitol, $1,800,000; the Speaker's office costs about $20,000 per year; the Clerk of the House costs $163,730 per year; different committees cost about $300,000 per year; the Doorkeeper of the House costs $250,000 per year; clerk hire of Members, $2,200,000 per year.

Graft and greed is not confined to any particular political party—each is equally guilty—the Democratic leader in the Senate formerly had 3 out of 5 secretaries close relatives—one a brother-in-law who lived in Little Rock, Ark., and drew a salary of $2,200 per year, while he was president, at the time, of the S.W. Joint Stock Land Bank. He was called a contact man.

The majority leader had his aged mother-in-law as a clerk. She received $2,580 per year and lived in Arkansas with her son, and did nothing to earn the pay. He took her off the pay roll when criticism came thick and fast, and appointed the wife of his nephew, to be certain not to violate the principle of nepotism. At the same time, the nephew was a clerk in the office.

During the Hoover administration, Senator TOWNSEND, of Delaware, was president of a construction company which did $200,000 worth of work for the Government in the District of Columbia. At the same time, his son was vice president of this company and secretary to his father's Senate committee, which passed on senatorial expenditures. The son drew $3,900 per year.

In 1932, Senator Brookhart, who is now in the Government service and a Republican from Iowa, drew a salary of $10,000 per year as Member of the Senate and had his son clerk of his committee at the time at $5,400 per year; another son, his clerk in the Senate office at $3,900 per year; and a daughter at a salary of $2,200 per year; and a brother referee in bankruptcy at $2,500 per year; and another brother bailiff in court at a salary of $1,800 per year; and a daughter, Miss Florence, on a salary of $2,200 per year, and Miss Edith took her place and finished school at George Washington University in Washington at the time she was supposed to be clerk in her father's office.

This is the same Republican now holding an appointment in the Department of Agriculture under the administration of President Roosevelt, which calls for a new deal. I know of no reason why this nepotic Republican, who drew $25,000 per year from the taxpayers through himself and family, should be rewarded with any Democratic patronage. Why give him a place when so many deserving Democrats are without means of support? This is part of the new deal with which I cannot agree, and know of no defense for his appointment from a Democratic viewpoint. Surely the ex-Senator is most selfish and far removed from being entitled to Democratic patronage. His own State at the time had a law against nepotism, yet we take up this Republican and defend his actions of greed and graft and appoint him to a position he is most unsuited to fill and most unworthy to adorn. While he was a Member of the Senate he was absent 49 days, making speeches at $200 and $300 per day, and should have deducted this salary, but no deductions were made. He drew $30 per day and was not present to earn one cent of it. He came to Washington to get his mileage and had the Clerk note his presence so as to perfect the graft and went to the disbursing clerk and drew $416 in mileage, which, as a matter fact, with a lower berth, would have cost only $97.48. The next day he went West and was lecturing to the people on public affairs and honesty in Government. "By their fruits ye shall know them." "Upon what meat hath this our Caesar fed that he hath grown so great?" Why give him an appointment anywhere? Certainly not a Democratic one.

Senator DICKINSON, the Republican keynoter of Iowa—"Hell-raising Dick"—had as his secretary Rollin Hunter, his son-in-law, on the House pay roll, and his son as clerk in his father's office at a salary of $275 per month. His son-in-law was listed as a messenger in the House post office, which may have meant a messenger or college student or just a plain excuse for collecting a salary off the taxpayers.

The Democratic keynoter, Hon. ALBEN W. BARKELEY, who spoke at Chicago, had a son and a daughter on the Senate pay roll as his clerks. His son drew $3,900 per year, and his daughter, L. L. Barkley, drew $1,800 per year.

Many others equally prominent might be mentioned if time would permit.

There is no rule governing the appointment of secretaries to Members of Congress other than the fact that no one appointee shall receive more than $3,900 of the $5,000 allowed per year.

The Members of the House and Senate are permitted to use their discretion in making their appointments.

To our shame, more than 50 percent of the Members of Congress appoint their relatives to Government positions. Not only do Members of Congress appoint their relatives, but the different departments are filled with the relatives of those in charge, all appointed because of being related rather than because of merit or fitness for the position to which they are assigned.

They are selected because of family tie rather than merit. This cannot be defended. It is practiced in the dark. If it cannot be defended in the light, it is indefensible anywhere and everywhere. Some are appointed who do not even come to Congress, and who perform only nominal public service, but look after the private or political affairs of the Members back in their home districts, at the expense of the taxpayers.

Many State legislatures have prevented this by statute. Then why should the Federal Government tolerate it longer in Congress or in any of the departments of Government? It permeates every department, from and including the White House down to the janitors who work in the Capitol.

It is most difficult to obtain the names of all the offenders. Time and space will not permit in a speech here to give them all. The report of the Clerk of the House is supposed to carry the names, as is also the report of the Secretary of the Senate. The report of the Clerk is obscure and concealed in a medley of statistics.

The congressional pay roll is most difficult to obtain, though it is supposed to be public. Those who endeavor to get access to the rolls are confronted with much difficulty and many questions. The clerks in charge frown upon them. They themselves are equally guilty of the practice, and have their next of kin on their pay rolls and staff, so it is necessary to prevent the "pitiless light of publicity" to be turned upon this system of family greed, graft, and selfishness.

The New York World recently carried this statement:

> It is of record that one western Representative, who was chairman of a committee, employed his son at $2,240, a daughter at $1,440, and a nephew at $2,230 a year. It is of record that one Senator had his wife for secretary, his father-in-law for a clerk, and a son engaged as a page. And one Congressman had his 15-year-old daughter down on the pay roll for $940 a year, which helped to pay the child's way in school and gave her the pin money that any schoolgirl can use incidental to getting an education.

We talk of unemployment. Why not get outside the family and afford others opportunities for a job and a position in the Nation's Capital?

They talk of the jobless and at the same time practice nepotism and contribute to the wrong of which they complain aloud to the country and the galleries, and while doing this in secret use dummies and so-called "working secretaries" in Washington who do most of the work and frequently receive least of the pay.

There is an army of wives, sons, daughters, and relatives yet remaining on the congressional pay roll at both ends of the Capitol. It has decreased some since the introduction of my bill on this subject in the House during the Seventy-second Congress, yet is practiced all too much.

The President of the United States and the Speakers of the House and the Senate each are guilty of this practice before the country and taxpayers of America today. The more prominent the offender the greater the wrong in the public eye.

STEAMSHIP CODE

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. REED] I submit for printing in the RECORD and appropriate reference certified copy of a report adopted by the Philadelphia Board of Trade, protesting the enactment of a steamship code, together with a letter of transmittal signed by H. W. Wills, secretary of the Philadelphia Board of Trade.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
Philadelphia, May 31, 1934.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I enclose you herewith certified copy of a report adopted by the Philadelphia Board of Trade, protesting enactment of a steamship code as referred to therein.

We would appreciate your having this presented and referred to the proper committee.

Very truly yours,

H. W. WILLS, Secretary.

EXTRACT FROM MINUTES OF STATED MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL, PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE, MAY 21, 1934

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
Philadelphia.

Your committee, having thoroughly considered and discussed the principles involved in the proposed establishment of the steamship code of fair practice, presents the following:

There being involved under the proposed steamship code the divergent interests of the coastwise, intercoastal, and foreign services, whose intricate operating conditions present such contradictory problems, your committee is at a loss to appreciate the advantage in the public interest which such a code, if established, would present. It would give the National Recovery Administration power of a legislative and judicious character, which power should be exercised only by those tribunals already created for the express purpose of exercising such power, viz, the Shipping Board Bureau and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Congress declined to vest in the Shipping Board Bureau minimum-rate authority. The proposed code, however, confers that power upon an administrator as the code authority. It provides that the administrator may utilize "the assistance of the Shipping Board Bureau and the Interstate Commerce Commission to the fullest extent deemed advisable by him."

There is no inference that the administrator is obliged to consult either or both these bodies more than he may see fit. This naturally precipitates a conflict under a dual authority, for it is inconceivable that the code administrator will seek to be governed by the views of the Shipping Board Bureau or the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It is the opinion of men competent to judge, and who attended the recent hearing at Washington, that the only serious advocates of the proposed code appeared to be the administrator, supported by a small group of shipbuilders and representatives of the American Steamship Owners Association. This hearing involved primarily the rate-fixing provisions of the proposed code and which provisions were vigorously opposed by representatives of many independent steamship interests, supported by representatives of large shippers' associations.

It is important to note that in the proposed code no differential rates are provided for tramp steamers. If the great volume of cargo is taken into consideration, moving as it does by tramp steamers in cargo lots—the great bulk moving from ports not served by regular lines—to foreign countries, it is easily discernible that with our treaties now in effect (favored-nation clause) varied and serious complications will arise, ending in reprisals against us tending to ruin American-flag services to foreign ports.

Your committee has in mind also the fact that the Federal Coordinator of Transportation has definitely advised that the railroads of the country, being already so thoroughly regulated under the Interstate Commerce Commission, should not be subject to codification under the N.R.A. By virtue of this definite opinion your committee would suggest that the steamship owners and operators under the American flag, being also subject to regulations laid down by the Shipping Board Bureau of the United States Department of Commerce, are entitled to similar consideration. That while our strictly coastwise and intercoastal steamship services might be susceptible to treatment under a code of some description, the Government of the United States could exert no authority of practical effect upon foreign services. Were these regulations attempted upon services operating to ports abroad under the American flag, the same would be subjected to unfair competition in the service, would suffer retaliatory practices at foreign ports, and such an experiment, if continued indefinitely, must serve to discourage to the point of extinction all operations in the foreign trade under the American flag, to advance which American taxpayers have already invested billions of dollars.

It is obvious from previous experience that vessels calling at the ports of the United States under a foreign flag could not be made to comply with the freight rates, wage conditions, and operating policies necessary in effecting satisfactory regulation of American-flag vessels under such a code, and consequently such regulation as might be placed on the American-flag vessel would ultimately prove an unfair restriction upon its enterprise in trade on the high seas and hence prove a compelling influence in the disorganization of American-flag operation.

Your committee would, therefore, recommend the executive council approve and authorize a suitable communication addressed Congress and proper administrative executives expressing opposition to further consideration or enactment of a steamship code.

On motion the report was unanimously approved and adopted.

True copy.

C. C. MORRIS, Vice President.

REPORT OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE MILITARY ACADEMY

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the Senate Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy made to me, as Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 25, 1934.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The undersigned members of the Senate Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy, visited that institution on May 15 and 16, 1934. Senators REED and LOGAN were unable to make the visit, due to the press of official business.

Arriving at the Military Academy at 10:15 a.m., May 15, we were met by the Superintendent, Maj. Gen. William D. Connor; then proceeded to headquarters, where the official salute was fired; the members of the administrative staff were met, and inspection of the headquarters offices and building made.

1 p.m., cadet parade and review.
2 p.m., departed for Washington.

The general impression gained by the Board of the personal and professional characteristics and performance of members of the administrative staff, academic staff, instruction and tactical personnel, and of the corps of cadets is that of great loyalty and devotion to the academy, of enthusiasm in the performance of their respective duties, and of high efficiency as a coordinated unit. Especially pleasing to the members of the Board was the conviction that this educational institution is one wholly dedicated to the real development of American democracy and a subordination of self to the sole and supreme purpose of service to the Nation and its people. It is very apparent that the motto of the academy, "Duty, honor, country", is observed in spirit and in results.

Following are more detailed observations of the Board:

OBJECTIVE OF THE INSTITUTION

The educational objective of the Military Academy is to give the graduate a broad foundation upon which to build his future life and to base his further technical studies in the Army service schools.

THE INDIVIDUAL CADET

The cadets coming as they do from all sections of the country and from all walks of life undoubtedly present a typical cross section of the American youth found nowhere else in the country except at the Naval Academy. The lives of all cadets are identical, and the former position of a cadet in civil life, whether from a social, financial, or other standpoint, has no bearing upon his status as a cadet, which depends entirely upon what he individually brings with him to the institution. A more democratic theory or treatment would be difficult to imagine.

The completeness of the educational plant in buildings and equipment and the beauty of the natural surroundings suggest the idea of luxury, since neither the Congress nor nature has been niggardly in its treatment of this national academy. It was gratifying, therefore, to find that the life of a cadet is marked by extreme simplicity in living conditions, both as to his quarters in cadet barracks and as to his subsistence. Every cadet has exactly the same type of clothing, bedding, furniture, and equipment. All live identically the same life and all must conform to the same requirements and measure up to the same standards. Two, or sometimes three, live in a room. The rooms are without ornament or luxury and are characterized by neatness, orderliness, and austere simplicity. Cadets sweep their own floors, make their beds, dust the woodwork, and arrange their belongings for daily inspection.

CADET TRAINING

As a cadet's training progresses, he is gradually given more responsibility. He commands at drills and ceremonies and assists in training cadets of the lower classes. He is instructed in the theory and practice of command, and emphasis is laid upon the proper and considerate handling of enlisted men.

In order that a cadet may better understand the point of view of the soldiers that he will later command, he is required to perform, at sometime, all the duties of an enlisted man from currying a horse to peeling potatoes. This practice was exemplified in the cavalry and artillery drills observed during the Board's visit.

While half of the corps was at military instruction, the other half was at intramural athletics, every cadet being required to play on a regularly organized team in some athletic sport. Companies alternate each day between drill and athletics and rotate in the various games that they play.

Unlike the student of other institutions, a cadet's time, his personal contacts, and practically all his activities are controlled and supervised by his military and academic instructors. The high standards of honor, deportment, and discipline can in a large measure be attributed to the fact that these instructors are themselves graduates of West Point, familiar with the viewpoint of cadets and zealous in maintaining the traditions that in times past have reflected credit upon their Alma Mater.

CADET MESS

On the 15th an inspection was made of the cooking facilities, mess equipment, and the dining hall. The cooking is done by civilian personnel with modern steam and gas equipment. The present gas equipment is operating at a 50-percent saving as compared with the cost of coal used with the old equipment. The kitchen equipment is plain, durable, and is kept immaculate.

The dining hall is sufficiently large to accommodate the Corps of Cadets at full strength at one time and is so arranged as to permit the cadets to enter and leave without confusion. The cadets are seated 10 to a table, with approximately an equal number from each class at a table. One civilian waiter brings the food for three tables and service at the table is performed by the cadets. Each member of the Board had lunch on the 16th at a table with nine cadets. We found the table service simple but scrupulously clean, and the food plain but very palatable and wholesome.

RATION ALLOWANCE

The ration allowance was reduced on April 1, 1933, by 15 percent, from 75 cents to 63¾ cents per day. This amount must provide not only meals for the cadets, but for all civilian mess employees as well and must pay for many incidentals in the upkeep of the mess, such as dishes, linen, kitchen utensils, and cleaning supplies.

Much difficulty has been found and is still being experienced in keeping within the present allowance of 67½ cents. The cost of food has increased considerably since the ration allowance was reduced, thus causing much more than a 15-percent cut. Only by the full use of the mess facilities, such as the bakery and the cold-storage and freezing equipment, and using the cheaper kinds of meat, can the cost to the cadets be kept near the allowance. Any additional expense over the authorized allowance must be paid for by the cadet from his pay. The original 80-cent allowance would be more in keeping with present-day prices.

HOSPITALIZATION

An inspection was made of the station hospital, which provides hospital and out-patient medical, surgical, and dental treatment for all personnel at the post, including cadets, officers, soldiers, and their families.

We found the hospital and allied medical activities very efficiently administered. The hospital of 112 beds was found to be immaculately clean, well arranged, and otherwise in excellent condition. The equipment is ample and of the most modern type. An additional ward is now under construction and will be ready for occupancy about the 1st of next June. This addition is of the most modern type, and will give additional facilities for the care of seriously ill patients and those patients suffering with communicable diseases who must be isolated.

The medical staff, composed of selected officers of the Medical Department, is well organized, and the character of work performed conforms to the highest standards of civilian institutions.

The percentage of sick is low, seldom running higher than 2.5 percent. No cases were very serious at the time of our visit, and about half of them were minor sprains and bruises, apparently arising out of the active athletic lives led by the cadets.

ACADEMIC WORK

The academic work at the United States Military Academy is carried on by 12 departments, each headed by a professor. Eight of the professors are permanent and four are detailed for periods of 4 or 5 years each. Nine of the professors are graduates of the Military Academy and three are graduates of civilian institutions.

Each professor is assisted by an associate professor or an assistant professor, or both, and a number of instructors, all of whom are detailed from officers of the Army with the exception of 3 civilians in the department of modern languages—2 Frenchmen and 1 Spaniard. Some of the instructors are graduates of civilian institutions, but the majority of them are graduates of West Point, many of the latter having done work in civilian institutions and holding degrees from them. A number of well-trained civilians, who are on the civil-service list, are also assigned to various departments to handle special lines of work, such as that of laboratory assistants and mechanics. The instructor personnel is believed to be very able and well equipped to perform their duties.

METHODS OF INSTRUCTION

We visited several different section rooms during recitations and were very favorably impressed by the enthusiasm, thoroughness, and drive with which the instruction was conducted. We met personally practically all the members of the academic board and discussed with them the courses of instruction.

Each of the four classes under instruction at the Military Academy is divided into sections of from approximately 12 to 16 cadets, depending upon the class and upon the subject of instruction. Each section is under the direction of an instructor, usually a commissioned officer of the Army. In modern languages, French and Spanish, native French and Spanish instructors are used to supplement the instruction given by the officer instructors.

In the section room in general the period of instruction ranges from 1 hour for certain subjects to 1 hour and 25 minutes for others. The necessary preliminary instruction is given at the beginning of the period. This instruction is intended to bring out points in the lesson of the day which have presented unusual difficulty to the cadet in his preparation of the lesson assignment, to extend the presentation set forth in the text, and to give to the cadet as broad a view of the subject as available time permits. Likewise, points in previous lessons which may still be causing trouble are cleared up. This preliminary instruction, which may last from 10 to 20 or even 30 minutes, depends upon the nature of the subject. The preliminary instruction is then followed by specific assignments to individual cadets, who usually prepare their assignments at blackboards for formal recitations. Others may undergo written tests at their seats. In many subjects during the period in which the cadet is preparing his work at the blackboard, or answering a written test at his seat, the instructor questions one or more cadets on the lesson of the day or on matter already covered. After a considerable length of time, cadets at the blackboards take their seats, the oral questioning is discontinued, and more or less formal recitations on various subjects of the day's assignment are made. In some subjects this work covers practically the entire period, and in others near the end of the period some 10 or 15 minutes are devoted to clearing up additional points not covered by the preliminary period of instruction or in the series of recitations. Each class under instruction is kept arranged in sections in each particular subject from the top to the bottom of the class on the basis of aptitude in that particular subject. Instructors are assigned to sections in accordance with their special aptitude for instruction in the part of the class to which assigned. The instruction is well coordinated, thorough, and painstaking. The small number of cadets in each section permits the instructor to have an intimate acquaintance with each of his pupils and a thorough knowledge of his difficulties.

In general, each cadet recites daily, is graded each day on his work of the day, and at the end of each week his grades for the current week are posted for his information. Any cadet deficient in any subject during his first 2 months at the academy is obliged to take extra instruction in that subject. Thereafter any cadet can have special extra instruction in any subject upon request.

INSTRUCTOR PERSONNEL

Instructors in charge of sections at the United States Military Academy are especially selected for duty as instructors, with due regard to their intellectual fitness, military bearing, temperament, maturity, as well as for their special aptitude in and preparation for work in the subjects taught in the department to which they are assigned. Only under special circumstances is any officer assigned to the Military Academy until he shall have been away from the academy for 4 years. The average age of instructors at the Military Academy is in the early thirties. They are men who have settled down to their profession of arms and who, by their services at the academy, in the Army after graduation, and by special training at educational institutions, have become equipped as teachers. They are dignified and serious in their work. Their enthusiasm, earnestness, and teaching ability appealed to us as being of a high order.

In order to prepare instructors for their duties at the Military Academy, many of them subsequent to graduation from West Point have pursued courses of instruction at educational institutions throughout the country, either obtaining degrees or receiving the benefit of special shorter courses of particular value to them.

Instructors in French and Spanish spend the first year of their detail as instructors in Paris or Madrid taking a special course in one of the national universities in the language of the country.

Once they are assigned to duty in a department at West Point, daily conferences are held by the head of the department, or by senior instructors qualified for such work, and during these conferences special effort is made not only to extend and improve their preparation for teaching but also to impress upon them sound pedagogical methods.

Heads of departments prepare themselves for this work not only through continuous study and practice but through frequent visits to other educational institutions. The percentage of instructors at the Military Academy who have taken post-graduate degrees after finishing their course at West Point is large. Likewise each department of instruction is well equipped with up-to-date departmental libraries, current educational literature, technical publications, etc.

We were particularly impressed with the fact that the Military Academy gets practically the choice of its graduates for duty as instructors. As stated above, these men are especially selected not only on their general fitness as evidenced by intellectual attainments and special fitness for the work they undertake, but also on the basis of their success as younger officers of the Army subsequent to graduation. Their efficiency reports are carefully examined, and none but the best are detailed for duty at the Military Academy. A similar condition of affairs can scarcely exist in any other institution in the world. It is well recognized that most educational institutions lose the cream of their product to more highly paid profession than the profession of teaching. Not so at West Point. Since all Army officers who have like grades and length of service receive the same pay, no such condition militates against the instructing staff. They are the choice of the Army for the work in hand, and they are held up to a high standard of performance.

BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS

The buildings of the academy are well adapted to the purposes for which constructed, and both buildings and grounds are maintained at a high standard and with a reasonable cost for maintenance. Most of the buildings in the central part of the post are constructed of stone and are fireproof. These buildings were not built for a day nor a year, but for centuries, and they gave an appearance of solidity, durability, and dignity in keeping with the spirit of the Military Academy.

It was a shock to see in the officers' apartment building and South Cadet Barracks, built within the last few years, that for the sake of economy brick instead of stone had been used for exterior walls. It is felt that such economy is not in the best interest of the Government, and that the cheaper construction detracts from the beauty and dignity of adjacent buildings which have already played an important part in the history and traditions of the Military Academy. All new construction and all changes in existing structures ought to be in keeping with the style of architecture and the quality of workmanship that now dominate in the institution. The granite used in the principal buildings was quarried from the adjacent hills, thus materially reducing the ordinary cost of such durable construction.

New construction at the Military Academy has followed a building program approved long ago by the War Department. For several years prior to 1933, the normal annual appropriation for this program was approximately $500,000. The allotment of $2,500,000 from the Public Works Administration has advanced the program materially. New construction, now in progress, includes a Quartermaster plant with warehouses, shops, commissary, and stables; 50 sets of quarters for lieutenants; nurses' quarters; two barracks for enlisted men; a grammar school for the children of the post; an extension of the present cadet gymnasium; a veterinary hospital; an incinerator, and a seawall and ramp for the airplane hangar. With the completion of the new construction now under way, the most immediately pressing needs of the Military Academy will have been met.

Some further construction is needed to complete the building program; the most important projects required are the completion of the extension to the cadet gymnasium, a garage for the official motor transportation, a storage plant for coal, and the completion of the road system at West Point.

Our visit culminated in a review of the entire corps of cadets. Such a ceremony by an organization enjoying the reputation of being the best drilled body in the world was indeed impressive.

There are appended hereto certain data in tabulated form which we recommend be studied.

RECOMMENDATIONS

That future Senate Boards of Visitors make the visit each year as a body and with complete membership, and spend not less than 3 days at the Academy.

That all appropriations for building at the Academy specify that such construction should be such material and architecture as to completely harmonize in appearance and permancy with the principal granite buildings.

Respectfully submitted.

MARCUS A. COOLIDGE,
ROBERT R. REYNOLDS,
ROBERT D. CAREY.

CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Augmenting the P.W.A. allotments the Military Academy was earmarked for 216,210 man-days' labor by the Civil Works Administration together with a grant of $303,086 for materials. A comprehensive plan for the employment of these resources was drawn up but the severe winter and slowness in dispatch of workers to West Point cut active operations under this heading to a meager fraction of the whole. The project as set forth provided such items as road construction, repair to buildings that had deteriorated under restricted maintenance of recent years, and utilities and structures required in connection with concurrent construction under P.W.A. operations.

Of the 216,210 man-days set up at the commencement of operations, only 26,537 actually reported and were employed. However, the labor and materials have been wisely expended and real benefits have accrued.

TAX ON FLOOR STOCKS—AMENDMENT

Mr. SMITH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3419) to exempt articles of machinery belting from the tax on floor stocks imposed by the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC HIGHWAYS—AMENDMENT

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 8731) to increase employment by authorizing an appropriation to provide for emergency construction of public highways and related projects, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS—STATEMENT RELATIVE TO PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, the two amendments which I hereby submit to the pending bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, to be inserted at the proper place in the bill, are to meet the conditions created by the Government itself—conditions that are continuing under Government administration, acts, and policies.

I refer to the known effect of the so-called "new deal" measures—the N.R.A. and the A.A.A.—on production costs of agricultural products.

The Government itself will not deny that the costs of agricultural production in this country have been increased by the so-called "price stabilization" policy of the N.R.A. and the processing taxes of the A.A.A.

The Department of Agriculture, the Consumers' Advisory Board of the N.R.A., the Department of Labor, and the Federal Reserve Board, have all produced data to demonstrate the existence of increased production cost whereby the farmer pays more for everything he buys, although he may receive less for what he sells.

This increase of agricultural production cost in the United States cuts down the power of the American farmer to compete either in the home market or in foreign markets. It amounts to a reduction of protective duties for agriculture—without such action as may be taken pursuant to the terms of the pending bill.

The American farmer has no crop to export this year or next, so that he can receive no benefit from the proposed expansion of foreign markets. His only hope for existence is a fair price for what he has to sell in the home markets. Reduction of duties to invite imports of foreign agricultural products means death to American agriculture under pretense of national recovery.

I ask that the amendment may lie on the table, be printed, and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the proper place in the bill to insert the following:

"Provided, That no reciprocal tariff treaties or agreements made pursuant to the provisions of this act shall reduce existing tariff duties on products of agriculture imported into the United States in competition with like products grown or produced in the United States."

At the proper place in the bill to insert the following:

"Provided, That pursuant to the terms of this act no reduction of tariff duties shall be made on imported articles entering into competition with like domestic products, the production cost of which has been increased by the Government through levy of processing taxes under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933."

Talbert, and John D. Talbert, sons, of James E. INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD FREIGHT RATES

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 256), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

[S.Res. 256, 73d Cong., 2d sess.]

Resolution

Whereas it is alleged that the present rate system adopted by the rail carriers of the United States has resulted in higher rates per mile in some sections of the United States than others notwithstanding efforts of Congress to make rail carriers a national system; and

Whereas it is alleged that proposals are now before the Interstate Commerce Commission to make rates on textiles considerably higher from one section of the United States than for a similar distance from another section of the United States: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to examine into the present railroad freight rates with a view to determining (1) the relative investment costs and the value fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the properties of class I railroads in the United States, separating such values so as to show the same in the various freight territories of the country, (2) the cost of hauling freight, or the cost per car-mile of the movement of freight, as determined by the Federal Coordinator of Transportation or from other sources, in each of the several freight territories, (3) the effect of making rates throughout the country and regulating, if necessary, the needs of the different carriers as was done in the New England Divisions case (261 U.S. 184), and (4) the methods pursued by freight associations and railroads in jointly prescribing rates. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable after the convening of the Seventy-fourth Congress, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

H.R. 9820. An act for the relief of the State of Nebraska.

PRICE FOR ELECTRICITY

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the magazine Today the leading article is by Judson King on the subject "What's an Honest Price for Electricity?" I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Today of May 5, 1934]

THE HIGH COST OF PRIVATE PROFIT IN PUBLIC UTILITIES—WHAT'S AN HONEST PRICE FOR ELECTRICITY?

By Judson King

It is rather amazing that after 25 years of State and Federal regulatory bodies, there never has been an investigation or compilation by any official agency of electric rates charged in the United States. Yet such information is constantly needed and demanded by Members of Congress, municipal, State, and Federal officers, especially progressive State utility commissioners.

Of late there has come a still more vigorous demand for this information from the people themselves. Not only the householders but merchants, professional men, and small power users, and even large manufacturers are uneasy. They have lost confidence in the utilities. They believe they are overcharged. They want to know what other consumers in other States and localities similarly situated are paying.

Most of them simply want to know what is an honest price for service by a private company.

Furthermore, they would like to have these rate schedules, usually as undecipherable as an Egyptian hieroglyph, made clear enough to enable them to figure comparisons. At present there is no uniformity or system in any State, let alone in the United States, and this multiplicity of schedules involving different methods of computation is filled with "demand charges", "service charges", "off-peak" and "on-peak", "variations", "coal clauses", "power factors", penalties, and rebates galore, until the average citizen gives up in despair the attempt to master his problem.

There will be national rejoicing, in consequence, over the investigation into electric rates throughout the United States which the Federal Power Commission has been directed to undertake.

Senator NORRIS easily passed the resolution calling for this inquiry through the Senate weeks ago, but Representative RANKIN, who comes from Tupelo, Miss., the first city to sign up for Muscle Shoals current, encountered opposition from both sides of the aisle.

There was delay in getting the resolution out of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Had it not been for the cooperation of Speaker RAINEY and the knowledge that the White House was firmly behind the resolution, it would have died on the calendar. The power people are opposed to this inquiry and they will be active in the campaign this fall.

Another factor inclined many Members to hesitancy—the prospect of a genuine inquiry and its correlation with others in progress.

For the first time, we have, under Chairman Frank R. McNinch, a Power Commission that respects seriously all the provisions of the Federal Water Power Act of 1920 and holds it is not a mere leasing agency for private enterprise. Mr. McNinch and his Commission prefer private to public operation, provided that private operators respect law established in the public interest. The Commission is by no means a radical body. However, it is keen for facts, and doubtless for that reason is, by order of the President, conducting inquiries into the power resources of the Nation, the transmission of electrical energy, and the cost of distribution.

Hence, this new inquiry into what the consumers are paying for electric service handsomely fits in with the other investigations showing what it actually costs the power companies and public plants to furnish such service.

We must note also the Federal Trade Commission investigation, which already has uncovered more than a billion and a quarter dollars worth of inflated securities put out by the leading power companies, on which dividends are supposed to be paid out of rates, and large amounts annually expended for political and propaganda purposes, all charged up to operating expenses and paid by the consumers. With a complete picture of the industry presented by these examinations, the people will have reliable data on which to base their conclusions as to whether they are being overcharged.

There are today around 15,500 communities in the United States served by some 1,627 private companies and 1,824 publicly operated plants. The only source of general information we have had to date is the annual rate book published formerly by the National Electric Light Association and now by its successor, the Edison Electric Institute. It originally was available to company executives only, but now may be purchased by nonmembers of the Edison Electric Institute for $25. No rates of public plants are included. It contains data for cities of 20,000 population and up (actually fewer than 500), representing only 3 percent of the communities which have electric service.

From all this, it will appear that Senator NORRIS and Representative RANKIN, by insisting upon the resolution, and the President, by promptly signing it, have performed a very useful service.

The Federal Power Commission will discover a startling variety of rates, levied without regard for cost of production or method of generation. If it be urged that rates are fixed by State regulatory commissions, the evidence indicates that the commissions must be as variable in their methods and moods as the rates.

Today the delivered cost of current in large cities, whether generated by water power or coal, varies so little that there is no legitimate reason for such sharp differences in rates to consumers. In large cities top rates run from 4 cents to 12 cents per kilowatt-hour, and in smaller cities and towns all the way from 5 cents up to 10 and 12 cents. In municipal plants the rates are generally lower, but here, again, there are wide variations, depending largely upon how much money the city fathers desire to take from the light plant and transfer to general funds.

Let us illustrate by concrete cases. An average family, living in a 6-room house, needs at least 180 kilowatt-hours per month for light, refrigeration, washing, ironing, sweeping, and a few small appliances.

In New York City the cost for this amount of current in 1932 was $9.55; in Chicago, $6.48; in San Francisco, $6.80; in Washington, D.C., $5.90. These are private plants.

In such plants the cost would have been in Jamestown, N.Y., $5.05; in Springfield, Ill., $4.20; Tupelo, Miss., now charging standard Tennessee Valley Authority rates, $4.10; and Tacoma, Wash., $3.20.

It is perhaps necessary to note here that the taxes and higher interest rates paid by private companies are more than offset by the amortization requirements of public plants and the sums they turn back into plant extensions or transfer to the city treasury.

Just now there is concern among investors in private-company securities that, if material rate reductions are made, their incomes will be cut off, the companies forced into bankruptcy and their savings lost. They will resent this new inquiry. It is not the purpose of the administration to disturb sound investments but rather to protect investors against wildcat speculation. Had the objectives now sought been reached 10 years ago, those thousands of persons who cast in their fortunes with those of Mr. Insull might have had their life savings in hand today.

It is a curious fact that those private companies which have been forced by regulation or by public competition to reduce their rates below the general level of private rates are today the soundest, most successful, and perhaps the most respected utilities in the Nation.

The history of the Electric Illuminating Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, is revealing.

In 1910 this was a typical coal-generating company, charging 10 cents per kilowatt-hour domestic, with commercial and industrial schedules proportionately high. Mayor Tom Johnson was informed by engineers that the total switchboard cost of generating current was only around 9 mills per kilowatt-hour, and that a municipal plant could sell domestic current at 3 cents, cut industrial rates by 30 or 40 percent, and still make money.

Mayor Johnson started the fight. His death intervened, and the $2,000,000 city plant, built by his successor, Newton D. Baker, began operation in 1914. The city council passed an ordinance ordering the private company to reduce its domestic rate to 3 cents. After 5 years the company's legal and technical experts proved to the satisfaction of the State public utilities commission and the State supreme court that the company had to charge 10 cents to protect its investors and give good service. This was in January 1919, and in the following June the company begged the city council to give it a short-time franchise, not at 10 but at 5 cents per kilowatt-hour. This was granted. The people were turning to their 3-cent plant for service.

At the time this 5-cent rate went into effect, companies in other large cities were charging from 8 to 12 cents. Did the Cleveland Electric Illuminating Co. go into bankruptcy? It did not. It has expanded from a $15,000,000 company in 1912 to a $140,000,000 concern covering all northeastern Ohio, selling at the uniform top rate of 5 cents, which lately has been reduced, in Cleveland, to 4 cents. It is very prosperous.

Meantime, the little city plant has grown from a $2,000,000 to a $20,000,000 concern, still selling at 3 cents. It is estimated that the competitive effect of the city plant has been to save the consumers of Cleveland more than $40,000,000 in the last 15 years.

Such instances could be multiplied. They prove beyond question that the private companies can make very material reductions in rates, remain prosperous, and assure sweet sleep to the holders of their securities. They raise the interesting question of how many millions of dollars have been extracted from the pockets of electrical consumers during 25 years above a "fair return" of 7 or 8 percent upon actual investment.

The balance sheets of municipal plants furnish further evidence that rates can be reduced without unjustifiable injury to investors. While many of the smaller public plants have rates as high as, or sometimes higher than, comparable private plants, all the more important ones have had much lower rates.

In 1917 householders of Los Angeles received service from their public plant at an average cost of 4.5 cents per kilowatt-hour as against a national average of 7.5 cents. Los Angeles now is down to 3.4 cents and the national average to 5.5; but in the meantime, out of earnings, the Los Angeles plant has put $40,000,000 into extensions and paid off $14,000,000 of bonds. Private companies do not amortize their investments and they finance extensions by the sale of securities.

If the city were financing its plant on a private basis, it could reduce rates further by 20 percent, according to Chief Engineer Scattergood.

Among farmers the same fluctuations of rates obtain throughout the Nation. Some have been paying top rates of 5 cents, others 8, others 10, and on up to 18 or 20 cents per kilowatt-hour. No one will contend that farm and small-town service can be uniform or as low as in larger places. But these spreads are all out of line with costs or common sense. Farmers of the Tennessee Valley region ere long will be getting Muscle Shoals current at around 3 cents per kilowatt-hour, and, at that, will be paying their own way, including taxes and without subsidy from the Government.

It will be highly interesting one of these days when the Federal Power Commission makes its report to lay existing rates, public and private, alongside the T.V.A. "yardstick" and then the Boulder Dam and others. To achieve success, however, they must have many municipalities connected, as do private superpower systems, and to that end cities desiring such service need financial aid not only to obtain loans from the Federal Government to set up competing distributing systems as now provided but to buy out existing private systems, when possible, and so avoid duplication.

A bill to accomplish this through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, introduced by Senator HIRAM JOHNSON, is pending in Congress. It should be enacted. Municipalities have difficulty in financing their plants from private sources. Let us give them a fair chance.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act is of daily concern to farmers in all parts of the United States. An article which gives that administration detailed and enlightening discussion appeared in the New York Times of Sunday, June 3, 1934. The article is by the highly capable administrator of the A.A.A., Mr. Chester C. Davis. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, June 3, 1934]

ONE YEAR OF THE A.A.A.: THE RECORD REVIEWED—THE ADMINISTRATOR SUMS UP THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF 12 MONTHS AND SURVEYS THE FUTURE, PREDICTING THAT THE NATION WILL NOT RETURN TO THE "TOOTH-AND-FANG" ERA OF INDIVIDUALISTIC FARMING

(A year has elapsed since the Agricultural Adjustment Act went into effect. Its effectiveness and its future are under sharp debate in Washington; the controversy centers about the proposal to extend the powers of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. In the following article the record of the 12 months is reviewed, some of the immediate problems surveyed and the future of the new deal in farming discussed by the man in immediate charge of the gigantic operation.)

By Chester C. Davis, Administrator of the A.A.A.

The launching of the greatest cooperative effort ever undertaken by farmers is the outstanding accomplishment of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration's first year.

Organizing themselves into county production control associations, 3,000,000 farmers in 48 States have signed contracts which make them voluntary partners in planning their production and improving their incomes. These contracts apply to four great staple export crops—wheat, cotton, corn-hogs, and tobacco.

Though incomplete, the experiment marks the beginning of a big-scale transition away from a purely individualistic agriculture. In 12 months these farmers have taken one long step to avert the merciless punishment inflicted upon them by planless competition with one another in an economic world dominated by the centralized and controlled forces of modern finance and industry.

A YEAR OF RECOVERY

The final test of this experiment in agricultural planning will be its benefits to farmers and society. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration's first year has been accompanied by substantial recovery in the economic condition of agriculture. This partial recovery has come from a diversity of causes, among which the better adjustment of supply with demand has been basic. Farm cash income has been increased through better prices due to production adjustments, to the President's monetary policy, and to the revival of city buying power following the Government's vigorous employment measures.

The farmer's cash income, including benefit payments, is up 39 percent for the past 12 months over that for the corresponding period a year ago. Although this income was partly offset by rising prices of things farmers buy, the buying power of farm commodities has improved 20 percent, as shown by the change in the farm price index, from 52 for April 1933, to 62 for April 1934. This index shows the net gain in the exchange value of farm commodities through price improvement alone and does not show the effect of benefit payments.

In addition to income through better prices, farmers have received close to $250,000,000 in benefit payments, rentals, and options paid in consideration of their cooperation in balancing production. These payments are designed to make up, so far as possible, the discrepancy between price and fair exchange value or parity, measured by the pre-war purchasing power of farm products, on that part of the crop consumed in this country.

"A GOOD BEGINNING"

These benefit payments are being successfully self-financed by processing taxes, not by appropriations from the Public Treasury. The increased buying power of producers of cotton, wheat, tobacco, and other products has had important effects upon recovery of industry and trade throughout the country. The program has worked, on the whole, as it was expected to work. A good beginning has been made.

The march of 3,000,000 farmers to join their county production control associations in a voluntary experiment of such scope is a dramatic and historic thing. But the drama of it is magnified as this unprecedented experiment in planned farm production encounters a vast natural calamity—a drought which, as I write, ranks among the greatest in extent and intensity among all rainfall shortages suffered by American agriculture.

This drought already has blasted production in parts of the Dakotas, Minnesota, and Nebraska. It has cut sharply into yields over a much wider area, including most of the corn belt. It has added the blind cruelty of nature to the punishment suffered by farmers through blind production in recent years. The experiment in agricultural adjustment therefore is to progress in 1934 not under normal and predictable conditions but under conditions which are abnormal in the extreme.

But acute need for agricultural planning always arises out of acute human distress. Ultimately, the usefulness of any farm plan would be measured not only by its function in meeting the everyday problems of agriculture, but also upon its adaptability to the unusual needs of extreme emergency.

THE FORCES MOBILIZED

The Agricultural Adjustment Administration has now mobilized its forces to combat the menace of drought. Cooperating with the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, the Farm Credit Administration, and with units of the Department of Agriculture, we have made a series of moves which have been reported daily by the press. What relief may fall from the skies upon the parched plains in the coming months we do not know. But the planning has been done, through provision for buying and removal of cattle, for movement of money, food, feed, and seed, and for encouragement of production of forage, to cope with drought conditions at their worst.

The predicament of burned-out farmers thus far this year is unprecedented, perhaps more because of the scope than because of the intensity of drought. Drought is no stranger to the American farmer. He had the shortest grain crop last year in 40 years, and the devastation of rainless 1894 is talked about in the West as a pitiless parallel of 1934.

NATURAL MISFORTUNES

Every year in this country some farmers somewhere see their crops ruined by drought, hail, flood, or pest. Year after year, farmers in these stricken areas have pleaded for some constructive social planning which would shield them from brutish exposure to unseeing natural misfortune. Such appeals have been based on the unanswerable ground that society loses when the productive power of whole regions is blasted, perhaps beyond recovery for several years.

Farm spokesmen have urged that common sense, humanity, and national security all demand provisions for assuring to agriculture some continuity of income against crop losses caused through no fault of the farmer. Such protection has been sought as a part of reasonable compensation and sensible safeguard of continuous production of the Nation's food and raw materials. These appeals all have contemplated agricultural planning practical enough to include large-scale crop-income insurance as a vital feature.

This was one of the needs which the Agricultural Adjustment Act was devised to meet. The adjustment plan will function in this way this year for all the hundreds of thousands of farmers in the drought States who signed production-control contracts. With this in view from the very first, the production-control contract payments have been based upon past averages of production, not upon the current production of the year in which the payment is made. Therefore the amount of the payment in any one year is not affected by the size of the crop that the farmer gets in that year. His yield may be burned out, hailed out, or flooded out, or destroyed by grasshoppers, chinch bugs, or weevils. But if he signs a production-adjustment contract and fulfills its terms, the farmer gets his benefit payment just the same.

In the drought area the farmer now has a taste of the same kind of protection which the flour miller long has enjoyed in insuring himself through the device of the hedge in buying wheat. Agricultural planning as worked out by M. L. Wilson and put into effect by the Adjustment Administration's production programs has offered in its first year the greatest crop-income insurance measure ever undertaken for farmers by any nation anywhere in the world. It applies to cotton, corn-hogs, and tobacco just as to wheat. It does not apply to dairying because the dairy industry has not united upon any program.

BENEFITS OF INSURANCE

What such crop-income insurance means in emergency can be understood from the fact that South Dakota farmers in last year's drought year got several times as much cash out of their wheat benefit payments as out of the sale of their poor little wheat crop. It is estimated that South Dakota farmers got $3,400,000 out of their wheat-benefit payments, and possibly only about $320,000 out of all the wheat they had left over for sale after feed and seed needs were met.

In time of a calamitous drought the crop-income insurance feature of agricultural planning may mean the difference between misery and sustenance, and the difference between prostration of the producing power of a region and a fighting chance for the farmer to get a new start in another year.

So the drought, while it has placed a great burden of responsibility upon the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and has intensified some and lightened other problems confronting the administration, has demonstrated the need for agricultural planning as nothing else could have done.

I am aware that there are people, many of them speaking vehemently for interests already safeguarded by efficient protective controls and devices, who denounce any planning and decry any protective devices for agriculture. But the individualistic "let-alone" philosophy becomes more repugnant the more closely its effects on agriculture are observed.

In its sheerest form, unplanned rugged individualism for agriculture means refusal of governmental assistance in collective effort of farmers to protect themselves against drought or any other similar calamity. It means exposure of the farmer to lone-handed contest with the blind forces of nature, with which his trade forces him always to match his strength. It means misery and starvation somewhere for some farmers every year.

Remember that agriculture nationally may be penalized by low prices due to surplus accumulation, while simultaneously some smitten areas may suffer the added penalty, due to drought, of having little or nothing to sell even at the depressed prices. I am now describing not some mere theory but the stark fact that staggered thousands of farmers last year and will confront them again in 1934.

A GLUTTED WORLD MARKET

Does anyone imagine that the stricken Wheat Belt would have had to take the modest market prices of 1933, or the inadequate wheat prices thus far this year, for any reason except long-continued surplus production and glutted world wheat markets? Because of the crushing combination of national and world surplus with regional drought, important spring and winter wheat States have been compelled for 2 successive years to take very modest prices for low yields of wheat. In this situation the benefit payments to those who cooperated in crop adjustments, while not large enough to compensate for crop shortage still were a big help.

The situation in the last 14 years has cried out for agricultural planning, production adjustment, and farm-income insurance. Grain merchants who collect the more commissions bushel by bushel when surplus ruins the price, and speculators who scramble for profits when drought raises the price, may not want farmers to do any planning of production. Many of them object to the thought that the farmers should even try to have any influence on price, or try to "hedge" collectively against the worst losses from drought. But I doubt whether the farmers of this country will ever want to go back to the dog-eat-dog individualism these opulent gentlemen prescribe in the place of agricultural planning which now has been begun.

The drought has brought into sharp relief the crop-income insurance features of the Agricultural Adjustment plan and has emphasized the fact that these provisions afford farmers a hitherto unattainable degree of protection from such misfortune on a higher and juster plane than that of charity. This protection could not have been afforded on an equal scale without governmental assistance, because the farmers, acting as individuals, could not combine either to influence production or to insure their crops. The Government, through this plan, has begun to perform a rightful function in protecting a great economic group which has been unable to protect itself.

But the insurance feature, while right now of superlative importance, is in the long run not the principal measure in the broad program of farm planning undertaken under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The main objective of agricultural planning is to seek and maintain, through good years and bad, the best possible balance between production and effective demand for farm products, so as gradually to restore parity of exchange value to agriculture.

While this does not necessarily mean curtailing production—it might mean encouraging greatly increased production—the biggest handicap to agriculture, as every farm administration in the past 12 years has recognized, has been caused by accumulation of surpluses of the staple crops.

PILING UP OF SURPLUSES

War-time expansion of plantings by 50,000,000 acres, followed by loss of export markets with this country's transition from a debtor to a creditor Nation and the resulting accumulation of surpluses all served to drive down farm prices.

One of the primary objectives of the farm plan is to get that 50,000,000 acres back into forage crops. The adjustment contracts have been drafted with this in view. Roughly, the removal from surplus production of about 40,000,000 acres has been pledged by farmers.

The adjustments in production of the basic crops represented by this shift, with favorable effects on prices and benefit payments to cooperating farmers, have been supplemented by other measures. These include the marketing agreements and licenses for fluid-milk producers and producers of certain fruit, vegetable, canning, and nut crops.

The agreements or licenses provide improved price schedules for farmers and eliminate unfair practices in processing and distribution of farm produce. Cotton and corn loans sustained prices of these commodities, assured the advantages of price increases to producers instead of to speculators, and provided badly needed purchasing power to two great farming regions, thus stimulating general business revival.

SUGAR AND BEEF CATTLE

At the present time the administration is undertaking programs for sugar, for beef cattle in connection with drought relief, and for a large number of special crops through agreements. These are in addition to the current programs of wheat, tobacco, corn, hogs, and cotton, including administration of the Bankhead Act.

Events during the Adjustment Administration's first year have confirmed the soundness of the basic objectives of the act, though they have also brought the necessity for numerous adjustments as to method. On the experience of the first year it is now possible to determine the long-time direction which planning for agriculture is likely to take.

Adjustment properly places increased emphasis upon transition away from production of the surplus crops, where markets have been glutted with oversupply. Unless and until the United States recovers its lost export markets, the adjustments in production will have to be made. They would be made under the sheer economic compulsion of low prices in the absence of any agricultural planning. The use of benefit payments to compensate farmers for making these adjustments facilitates accomplishment of the transition without the economic disturbance and widespread individual losses and the unfavorable consequences to business and industry which would otherwise occur.

Such relief from grain surplus as is gained at the fearful cost of drought alters the A.A.A. problem in some respects, but not in others. Crop loss of this kind, concentrated in a definite area, has about it none of the fairness of adjustments which are spread equally over all farms. But it does have temporary price effects which, while they do not compensate farmers fairly for losses, do tend to induce new production.

ACREAGE AND VOLUME

The long-time relationship between acreage and volume of production is very close, despite the disparity caused by a year or two of severe crop damage. The man whose whole crop is ruined has not reduced wheat or cotton in the sense that he would have done if a proper portion of his farm had been transferred into permanent pasture. Drought has temporarily reduced the grain surplus and has reduced the immediate visible incentive to get from grain to grass. But it has affected very little the permanent need for that transition, or for agricultural planning to help bring it about.

Keeping uppermost in mind the long-time aspects of the agricultural adjustment, even while placing in action the emergency programs for cotton, wheat, corn, hogs, and tobacco, we have established in the Adjustment Administration a planning division under direction of H. R. Tolley.

This division is now working on plans for the future course of the Adjustment Administration. This course will iron out many of the crudities in the present emergency programs. The division will gather information to forearm the A.A.A. as to the outlook for agriculture, and the future objectives for assuring continuance of sound recovery.

Changes from present methods probably will involve selective distribution of lands removed from surplus production and the use of a composite contract to cover all products grown on a farm, rather than single crops. This would reduce administrative machinery and expense, and increase the total benefits available for mixed farming regions.

MARGINAL LANDS

Permanent removal of submarginal lands from crop production will be part of a long-time effort that must be made. The planning division is cooperating with the Department of the Interior and the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation in working out the details of this program. Twenty-five million dollars already has been provided to finance a beginning.

This means planning for better use and conservation of the Nation's soil resources. Submarginal lands which now are poverty farms can be gradually removed from surplus production and be put into use as forests, parks, game refuges, and preserves. Water and timber resources of the soil can be conserved. Erosion, which has been destroying the fertility of our soil just as surely and completely as it has devastated the Yellow River Valley of China, can be checked.

All these measures will contribute not only to the prosperity of agriculture and to alleviation of human distress but also to the safety and welfare of the whole country. Good soil is the ultimate foundation upon which this welfare rests. The recent dust storms have been a dramatic reminder of the peril to our soil resources to which we have been brought by long years of shameful neglect.

The ruthless policy toward agriculture which this country pursued forced the farmers into unsound crop practices, mining the soil to produce surpluses, and robbing it of precious fertility. The enlightened policy now being followed makes it possible for farmers to conserve soil resources by keeping lands out of useless cultivation of surplus crops, and by planting soil-building and erosion-preventing cover.

MANY HUMAN PROBLEMS

The Agricultural Adjustment Administration's first year has brought forth a host of human problems. Work as we would, we never have been able to move fast enough to meet the needs of agriculture. Think of the task involved in handling 3,000,000 contracts, of verifying them all and mailing out checks to the farmers. It has taken much more time than we planned, and the delay hurts the farmers when they desperately need the money. Think of the achievement of the 3,000,000 farmers in organizing the production-control associations. To hundreds of thousands of them the whole idea was new and the social experience of working with their neighbors on production problems was unprecedented.

Large numbers of cases of individual dissatisfaction have arisen, as is inevitable when millions of adjustments have to be made in a program so new. Our delays in getting out checks and the numerous administrative technicalities of it all have irritated farmers.

Then there have been numerous petty misunderstandings, bickerings, and complaints, oftentimes deliberately fomented to arouse sectional jealousies; for example, complaints from the West that the South was getting $160,000,000 in cotton payments, from people not stopping to think that the corn-hog producers also will get a comparable sum.

We have heard agitation against the jute tax from Idaho, though the increase in shipments of Idaho potatoes to Atlanta increased from 5 cars in 1932 to 33 cars in 1933 after the cotton plow-up, and the tax on the bags was just a drop in the bucket compared to the increased demand in the more prosperous South for the Idaho potatoes that went into the bags.

OPPOSITION TO TAX

The Agricultural Adjustment Administration could have had an effective cattle-buying plan in operation weeks ago in the drought States, and strong income-insurance protection to the dairy producers there. But opposition to the processing tax, apparently in many instances inspired by the processors for obvious reasons, caused us to amend the beef-cattle plan and defer the dairy plan.

It is not the policy of the Adjustment Administration to impose any program upon any farming industry. It must be convinced that an overwhelming majority of the farmers want a program so as to insure a practicable degree of cooperation before the administration undertakes to place a program in effect.

The difficulties I mention are, in a sense, only minor when compared to the achievement of enlisting 3,000,000 farmers in a voluntary attack upon basic production problems. But the outcome will depend upon how greatly such irritations finally weigh after the new and difficult ground is broken and when balanced in true perspective against the program's substantial benefits. The farmers will determine what will be the future of the Agricultural Adjustment undertaking. Many improvements and changes will be made in the program as time goes on. But I do not think that, once they understand the fundamentals involved, farmers will give up agricultural planning for the "tooth-and-fang" individualism of the old-deal days.

"CRIME AND A REVISED NATIONAL POLICY IN EDUCATION"—ADDRESS BY SENATOR COPELAND

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the able Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] delivered an important address on May 18 before the American Council on Education. He discussed the subject of Crime and a Revised National Policy in Education. It is a subject to which he has given earnest study. He has made a tremendous contribution to social service and to crime cures at the source. This address deserves to be widely read. I ask unanimous consent that Senator COPELAND's address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

CRIME AND A REVISED NATIONAL POLICY IN EDUCATION

Because of the interest of your director in my work, each of you has received a copy of the digest of testimony presented before the Committee on Crime, of which I am chairman. My address to the Cleveland convention of the National Education Association on the subject of Education and Crime Prevention has been reprinted in your journal, the Educational Record. Copies of my address in the Senate on January 11 have been supplied to many of you. I assume, accordingly, that the invitation for me to speak before this group today was prompted by a desire to hear more about the educational policy I have set forth, and particularly by a desire to have me point out its relation to the work of your American council.

In essence, that policy calls for prompt and continuous readjustment of educational aims and methods as conditions and necessities change. We are in a war against ignorance and crime; battle fronts must shift as we discover the movements of the enemy.

The primary lesson gained from our senatorial investigations is that antisocial conduct looms as a greater national menace than ever before in our history. In consequence, we must develop a quality of character higher than that required by any previous social order.

I wish time served to discuss the significance of the greater freedom and range of choice that comes to each succeeding generation of young people. As I see it, the only way to equip youth for this freedom is to formulate a suitable, but not too inflexible, pattern of social habits. Then we must help them to accept and adopt standards of value which will appeal to their intelligence and influence their choice of the right behavior.

There is abundant reason for alarm today because of the fact that large numbers of professional men, with highly developed intellectual capacity, have displayed utter lack of inclination to live by the codes of ethics of their respective professions. I need not enumerate well-known examples in the persons of lawyers who have amassed wealth through aiding and abetting criminals and helping predatory interests to keep within the law. The public is informed of cases of ostensibly respectable attorneys receiving annual retainers for advice and counsel as to how to commit criminal acts with a minimum of danger of conviction. The list is so long that there has been a complete undermining of the confidence of many of our people in the ethical standards of professional men.

We ask ourselves: Upon what agency can we depend to make sure that the next generation is brought up with a more adequate sense of trusteeship than the present generation has disclosed? Is there any single agency under public control, other than the schools, to bear the responsibility of training in the qualities of citizenship essential to modern cooperative living?

You all know I ask this question without a thought or inference that the public schools have been remiss or negligent in the past. Rather, I make the question a preface to issuing a challenge to the public schools of the future.

My thinking is colored, naturally, by experience in health education. Experience in that field indicates that the greatest return for energy expended comes from our work with children—the children of tender years. If you have read the testimony at the hearings before the Committee on Crime, you will find data to support the hypothesis that the most critical years for citizenship training are the early years of the child's life in school.

During the New York hearings I was greatly distressed to hear a well-known and highly placed professor state that preceptorial instruction is useless in character education. I am well aware of the importance of example and the necessity of placing increased emphasis on developing habits which make for social effectiveness. But so long as authorities deny any place to precept in the character-training program, my old-fashioned mind insists that there is a crying need for further research in the field of better character and improved citizenship.

I have been much impressed by the inability of the motion-picture industry to find ways of interpreting and applying the results of the Payne fund researches in that field. This is too bad as I view it. Personally, it seems to me we should not be content to see research in character education halted until the movies, the public press, the radio, and all the general educational agencies are contributing, through voluntary cooperation, only that which is of positive value to the lives of our young people. Neither should we be content until such time as we find how to coordinate the efforts of all the character-building agencies—the Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, the Big Brother movement, the 4-H clubs, and the two hundred other more or less prominent national movements, which are contributing to the prevention of juvenile delinquency, as well as to the happiness of our boys and girls. We certainly need closer cooperation with the home through the parent-teacher movement and similar agencies. I venture to suggest also that we must find some more effective means of giving force to these religious influences which are brought to bear upon the inner life of the youth.

I appeal to you for support in character education of a research program whose scientific worthwhileness, if I may use the word, will be built upon a better record system than is yet in customary use. I am not unmindful of the valuable efforts of the American Council on Education in spreading the use of the continuous-record card. I observe that Dr. Charters follows me on this program. He can be counted upon to discuss and press newer techniques which we may safely accept. I merely refer to the elementary fact that good records are basic to scientific thinking and scientific criticism. We medical practitioners took a long forward step when we adopted the practice of keeping complete records of the condition and progress of every patient. My emphasis on the use of continuous behavior records is due to the conviction that without them children will not be dealt with properly, no matter how competent the teachers may be. In the modern scientific sense a child cannot be understood in the absence of a behavior record kept from early childhood. Without it the diagnosis of the teacher is founded on nothing more substantial than an expression of interest, affection, or a mere "hunch." In this, I am merely supporting the admonition of Professor Morrison, of Chicago, when he entreated teachers to "learn" their children before trying to "teach" them.

May I venture to urge also the responsibility resting on you in relation to the character of the graduates from your colleges and universities? We all know that professional degrees are granted in large number without any genuine examination into the moral character of the men receiving these degrees. So far as I know, never before has a nationally representative body, like this council, fairly faced the implications of the fact that a degree or other credential from an educational institution at the present time certifies only to scholarship and technical competency. Only a national crisis like this could give force to the question, Do we not owe it to society and to our Nation to see to it that no one receives a credential and the implied endorsement of one of our institutions unless he has established a behavior record to justify its receipt? The granting of a degree should represent a vote of complete confidence in the character, sense of service, and public spirit of the recipient. It is my belief, as you know, that there should be a review and a restatement of the objectives of education. In my opinion, too, these times demand of every institution that it check objectives to see that qualities of citizenship and character have an adequate place in plan and practice.

You are far more competent than I to decide how much attention should be given the character status of your entering students, the observation of their behavior while they are with you, and the guidance and treatment essential to developing the best capabilities of each of your undergraduates. My purpose in coming here today is to ask, in all respect, that you reflect upon your objectives and practices in dealing with these responsibilities. Particularly, I ask that you consider how your policies fit in with the sound national policy which demands looking toward training in citizenship and a sense of social responsibility throughout the educational career of every youth.

You won't mind my saying that you will not have adjusted your policy completely until we have a new deal in education. We shall not be contributing to that quality of citizenship to which I have referred until the fundamentals of American education are set up in terms other than the "three R's" and schoolbook content. The practice of the past in focusing upon subject matter needs no defense. A century ago the need of the times was for a higher level of literacy. Just as clearly today the need of the times is for a higher level of character.

In this company, such a statement is a platitude. But we shall not have a revised policy recorded as the settled will of the American people, and we shall not be fully free to act upon such a policy, until the boards of education of every school district of this land and the majority of the people of these United States have come to understand and accept our standard. I have come here to ask your collaboration in a drive to win universal acceptance of the idea that citizenship, rather than the "three R's", should be regarded as the foundation of American education.

You are turning out each year hundreds of thousands of men and women who will be largely responsible for forming the public opinion of the next generation. We must depend upon you that, through your faculty and students, this educational policy shall be established if it is deemed worthy of general acceptance.

There can be no doubt that training received during the tender years has a basic influence upon character. It follows, then, that the hope of recruiting into your student body boys and girls of well-matured personality, depends upon your success in extending character training throughout the public-school system. To this end, you must exert the same sort of leadership in character education that traditionally you have exercised in the field of content and scholarship.

Such leadership must be founded on patient study of the problem. It involves a determination of the quality and range of technique appropriate for each age group. You will guide and train dynamic leaders and supervisors to construct adequate citizenship programs and to administer them effectively. You will train a new generation of teachers prepared according to new specifications. The new teacher-training program will center upon the practices and perhaps the insight, through which teachers will learn to know their pupils as human beings, rather than upon subject matter through which students may achieve high scholarship. The new teacher will come to understand how to use the methods which specialists have developed through the child-study clinics. When this system is perfected and in use, we can afford to be reconciled to some sacrifice in mastery of intellectual content and of acquaintance with historic educational methods.

You will appreciate the success with which you have trained these teachers and the success with which you have built up public opinion to support them, when a new generation of youth, trained by the new teachers, offers itself for admission to the higher educational institutions. If you have succeeded, applicants for matriculation will meet the high standards which you will then set for character, as fully as they meet the high standards which you now set for scholarship.

I should be truly sorry if the teaching profession should decide to continue the old objectives of scholarship which have a minimum concern for the moral, ethical, and social training of the student. In achieving the new program you will have the double task of turning out graduates of high character, as well as of high achievement in scholarship and technical competency, but the results will be well worth the price.

By this time you may be asking yourself the question: "What is the most promising beginning of a new deal in education?" Reflection upon this question calls for an expansion of my earlier addresses in which I argued for research and the establishment of spearhead demonstration centers. I feel confident of a sympathetic understanding of my suggestions in this field, because I know of the emphasis that the council has placed upon research in the past. Dr. C. R. Mann, your director, and the editors of the Education Record have been diligent in seeking out and reporting important experiments and researches.

I am appealing for your collaboration with the Education and Law Conference associated with my committee, in all those projects designed to improve the technique of citizenship training and promote the acceptance of this technique by all our schools. The statement cannot be too often repeated, that there is a critical need for expansion of knowledge in this field and for adoption of higher standards of quality in citizenship training.

My attention has recently been called to a bulletin of the Office of Education, No. 11, published in 1931, entitled "Educating All the Children of All the People." Many, if not all of you, have this publication in your files. This bulletin describes an interesting experiment of the Granite Consolidated School District of Utah, an experiment designed to achieve unusually broad objectives. In its preface, outlining these objectives, the bulletin states that "Education, in the large sense, includes the duty of following up every child to the age of 18, for 365 days of the year, in and out of the classroom, with the aim of helping him develop his capacities to their greatest usefulness."

I ask you to review this bulletin and to reflect upon the effect of achieving, on a national scale, the objectives which are stated therein. If we accounted effectively for every boy and girl up to the eighteenth year, as they undertake to do in Granite district, the evidence seems to indicate that we would cut our crime bill at least in half. What is more important, we would, through guidance, greatly multiply the happiness and usefulness of large numbers of youngsters now maladjusted. Obviously, this program calls for an extensive coordination of efforts in the community. It assumes a broadened administrative policy, as well as a pupil-centered program in guidance and teaching. Such a demonstration deserves national recognition and the support of the best technical advice available, to insure the achievement of its fullest national values.

It has been your policy in the American Council to give encouragement to such projects by extending recognition to them. Last year's program was devoted to such encouragement of four great demonstrations in as many States. I am advised you thus recognized the Nebraska experiment in individualized instruction. As I understand it, it is in the same general field as the Winetka experiment and the experiments with the Dalton plan. All of these are in a field of experimentation which leads us toward a pupil-centered, rather than a content-centered, education.

The question I raise is, Would these demonstrations be benefited by receiving added recognition at this time? Should we of the education and law conference collaborate with you in the encouragement of these fertile experiments? Have you set a precedent which we, with others, should follow, in your appointment of a joint advisory committee for Dr. Ballou's project?

Dr. Ballou and Dr. Charters, who will follow me, are far more competent than I to discuss the technique for the conduct of such spearhead experiments. I must run the risk of anticipating their addresses by saying that the theory of the spearhead attack involves the abandonment of "panaceas" in education. It assumes that a good educational job involves putting to work all the good ideas, good techniques, and information known to the education profession. It assumes a plan of attack which begins by fully modernizing the instruction program in a few centers, taking them on, if necessary, one at a time.

Further, while we are learning to do a quality job in each center, we must learn how to adapt the procedures learned in that center, to other schools and other persons all the way across the land. We must do this, moreover, by methods which fall within the available financial and human resources of the average community. I am aware that hundreds who have been convinced of the merits of the Winetka and Dalton programs have adopted these plans, only to fail in practice through a lack of information as to the detailed steps necessary to the transition. For myself, I am entirely willing, and I am sure this will be a relief to those who have suffered my preachments, to do everything possible to aid a plan of initiating, one at a time, growing centers of pupil-centered programs. These should adequately express a new deal in education, both in breadth of objectives and in techniques employed.

To summarize, let me say, the present national emergency demands that you, as leaders of American education, shall do something now about citizenship training. I invite your attention to what I regard as the two major considerations:

First. Let us restate our national policy in terms of personnel objectives and win popular support for our plan. We seek a dynamic policy which shall bring about continuous progress.

Second. Let us achieve in practice a new deal in education. My associates in the technical committee of the education and law conference are organizing and assisting in spearhead demonstrations of the new deal.

We are proud of the past evolution of our American schools, in which you have played a distinguished part. I would join with you in volunteer and unofficial efforts to further a continuous and a more rapid evolution.

THE STRIKE CRISIS—ARTICLE BY SENATOR WALSH

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, in the New York Times of yesterday appeared an interesting article written by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], Chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, entitled "To Combat the Strike Crisis, WALSH Urges the Wagner Bill." I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, June 3, 1934]

TO COMBAT THE STRIKE CRISIS, WALSH URGES THE WAGNER BILL—THE MASSACHUSETTS SENATOR SAYS THE MEASURE, WHILE DEFINING UNFAIR PRACTICES, WOULD LEAVE EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES FREE

(By DAVID I. WALSH, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor)

A rising tide of labor unrest is plainly manifest. Strikes and threats of strikes are increasing in number and magnitude. We are witnessing riots and bloodshed and many fear we may witness more. Indeed, signs on the horizon seem to point to more strikes rather than less during the coming months. Industrial peace—an indispensable element of industrial recovery—is in serious jeopardy.

Whence come these labor difficulties? What are their causes? Can the causes be eliminated? And if that be impossible, how ought the resulting situation be dealt with? These paramount questions admit of no short and easy answer.

The causes of labor disputes are various, and some of them are inherent in a society where men are free to work or not, according to their will, and employers are free to employ whom they will. And I am moved to add that America wants no other sort of society.

THE RIGHT TO STRIKE

Labor, with a capital "L", regards the right to strike as one that cannot be alienated and of which it cannot be deprived except in circumstances where public safety is jeopardized. The public necessity of the operation of our railroads as paramount to the right of rail employees to strike has been upheld by our courts. Strikes by these employees and by public employees are exceptions to the rule. As matters stand today it is neither lawfully possible, nor, in my judgment, socially expedient to attempt under the guise of public necessity and public safety to outlaw all strikes by legislative fiat.

If we accept the foregoing premise, then it is obvious that we cannot by statute make arbitration of all labor disputes mandatory, for compulsory arbitration, if it is to be effective, must carry with it compulsory obedience, and that destroys the right to strike.

Disputes between employer and employee resulting in strikes and lockouts have been said to be a usual accompaniment of a period of increasing production and rising prices. That has been the record in the past. Labor disputes at the height of a boom or at the bottom of a depression have been less common. At the bottom, the worker has been willing to work on any terms. At the top the employer has been willing to employ on any terms. These are broad generalizations, but sufficient for the present discussion.

INACCURATE DIAGNOSIS

The present labor unrest and the rising tide of strikes are being pointed to as indubitable proof that industrial recovery is in progress, and as a usual and indispensable concomitant of recovery. This seems to me to be a superficial and inaccurate diagnosis.

There is a highly important and significant distinction between the predominating causes of the present labor troubles and those in prior periods of labor unrest. Wages and hours of labor have been the predominating causes of a majority of our strikes and lockouts in the past. Wages and hours of labor are not the predominating causes today.

The more prolific and the more deep-seated cause of the present strikes and threats of strike is with respect to the right of collective bargaining and the efforts of labor to organize and to be organized. It is important to keep in mind that prior to the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act only a small percentage of industrial laborers were members of labor unions. Certain large industries were highly organized. There have been few strikes, if any, in these industries. But taking on the one hand the total number of the men and women employed in industry, or potentially to be employed in industry, and on the other hand the total roster of all of the trade unions affiliated with national labor organizations, it is apparent that by a large majority labor was nonunion.

Congress, in setting up a new deal for industry in N.R.A., likewise provided a new deal for labor. No section of the recovery act was more intensely disputed than section 7a, both in the framing of the bill and in its subsequent operation. Section 7a provided "that employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor or their agents in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection." That is not all of section 7a, but it is the crux of it.

Collective bargaining presupposes some kind of organization of employees. Existing national labor organizations quite naturally sought to organize employees and to bring them within their folds. Labor organizations independent of the American Federation of Labor, in some plants and in some industries sought to preempt the field for themselves. Such employers as viewed with reluctance, if not with hostility, the organization of their employees into the regular trade union sought covertly or openly to discourage such organization or to encourage the maintenance or formation of the employees-representation plan, usually, but not always accurately, described as the "company union."

This drive for the spread of employees' organizations as a vehicle of collective bargaining is, in my opinion, at the root of a great deal of our present labor troubles. It was largely inevitable. The relations between employer and employee are in a transition stage. Many employers are resisting the onsweep of the closed shop. Some of them openly declare that they will never under any circumstances bargain collectively with a labor union.

READJUSTMENTS AHEAD

Congress has laid down the principle of a collective bargaining. That principle, in my judgment, is here to stay, irrespective of the future or the permanence of the N.R.A. That means that we are in for a long period, and how long no man can say, of readjustments of the relationships between the employer and the employee. And these readjustments are bound to be attended by disputes and by strikes. I see no escape from it.

The best that we can hope for is for some degree of reasonable restraint and tolerance and fairness on both sides, and, as far as the Government itself is concerned, for the setting up of such appropriate agencies for conciliation and mediation, for voluntary arbitration and for the enforcement of fair play as may be possible and feasible under our form of government.

Neither the present National Labor Board nor the proposed National Industrial Adjustment Board can be an enforcer of industrial peace. It cannot settle strikes. It can harmonize and it can conciliate, but if the two sides insist on fighting, it can be little more than an umpire, little more than a referee who shall insist that both sides observe the rules of the game, with authority to call a foul or to disqualify if the rules are violated. And the rules are the unfair labor practices which it is proposed to define by statute.

The National Labor Board, created last year by Presidential Executive order and headed by Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, of New York, has valiantly attempted to compose labor disputes, to interpret the collective-bargaining provision of the N.R.A., and to ascertain and inhibit unfair labor practices. The jurisdiction of this Board and its authority have been challenged in various instances, and there has been very general recognition of the desirability, if not, indeed, the necessity, of some statutory enactment defining the Board's powers and procedure if it is to be an effective and permanent instrumentality for the adjustment of labor disputes.

THE WAGNER BILL

It was the apparent need for legislation along this line which was the genesis of the Wagner labor disputes bill, introduced in Congress early in the present session. This bill, in the form introduced, provoked a vast deal of controversy, and the subject was fully aired in extensive hearings before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor.

The committee has now favorably reported to the Senate a substitute bill which it is proposed to entitle the "National Industrial Adjustment Act" and which proposes to create a national industrial adjustment board to supersede the present National Labor Board. The substitute bill seeks to meet many of the objections raised to the original bill, objections which in the judgment of our committee appeared to have considerable validity.

Nothing in the bill allows the National Adjustment Board or any other branch or agency of the Government to fix wages, to regulate rates of pay, to limit hours of work, or to affect or govern sanitary or similar working conditions in any establishment or place of employment. In such matters the Board (like any nongovernmental group of persons) is available for voluntary arbitration if, and only if, all the parties invoke its aid.

As now drafted, the bill does not apply to domestic servants or agricultural laborers. It does not affect establishments in which less than 10 persons are employed, and it does not relate to individuals employed by their parents or spouses.

There is nothing in the bill which requires any employee to join any form of labor organization or any employees in any industry to form a labor organization. If employees choose to organize, nothing in the bill will prevent them from organizing a shop committee or a union for a particular plant or company, free and independent of any national or international organization as well as of any employer.

In cases in which employees choose to belong to an organization there is nothing in the bill to compel an employer to make a closed-shop agreement with that organization or to consent to a deduction of pay to meet the dues of that organization (that is, the check-off). These matters are left to the parties to settle by the orderly process of collective bargaining, and free from suggestion, much less direction, from the Government.

LOCAL MACHINERY

There is nothing in the bill which makes it impossible for grievances or disputes to be settled locally or through the aid of appropriate machinery in the several States; and every effort has been made to avoid the embarrassment and inconvenience to both employers and employees of being called to settle in Washington a dispute which might be adjusted locally.

The Board is not going to be empowered to settle all labor grievances. The quasi-judicial power of the board is restricted to four unfair labor practices and to cases in which the choice of representatives is doubtful, and even the Board's compulsory action is limited to cases that have led or threaten to lead to labor disputes that might effect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce. Employers and employees engaging in a local or intrastate business are not within the jurisdiction of this bill.

The Board is not given any unusual powers to hear evidence, summon witnesses, or require testimony. Every power granted to the Board with respect to the taking of testimony, summoning of witnesses, and like matters, is duplicated in at least a majority, if not all, of the Federal administrative tribunals, such as the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, and the proposed communications commission.

The bill is designed primarily to clarify rather than to extend the existing law governing relations between employers and employees and to provide for a means of enforcement. Briefly stated, the measure defines merely those acts by an employer that interfere with the right of employees to engage in collective bargaining.

ORDERLY HEARINGS

A second important objective is to establish some orderly method by which cases involving supposed violations of the law may be heard. At the present time there exist many different Federal (not to mention State) agencies that deal with labor questions. The Department of Labor has a conciliation service; the National Recovery Administration has a compliance board; the National Labor Board, set up by Executive order, exists in Washington and 20 regional boards have been established throughout the country subordinate to that National Labor Board; and recently the N.R.A. has been establishing in various industries industrial boards.

It is important that these agencies should not be multiplied, lest parties fail to know either the proper tribunal to which to resort or the proper construction of law to follow. Three essentials of justice are that it shall be administered promptly, clearly, and with finality. By establishing a quasi-judicial board this bill definitely establishes the agency that shall give the final administrative interpretation of the law. Of course, court review remains available, as it always does under our system of Government.

Another important aspect of the bill, as amended, is the emphasis it places on the strictly judicial aspect of the work of the Board. It is not primarily a prosecuting agency to ferret out offenders. So far as possible all disputes will continue to be adjusted by conciliatory methods, such as those used in the Division of Conciliation of the Department of Labor. When a case cannot be adjusted because of the continuance of unfair labor practice or because of disputes over representation, it can be referred to the National Industrial Adjustment Board, which can then judicially consider it. This makes two things plain: First, the Board is to enforce the law as written by Congress; and, second, the Board acts only when enforcement is necessary and adjustment has failed.

UNFAIR PRACTICES

The bill declares that it shall be an unfair labor practice (the conduct of an employer that abridges his employees' rights) "for an employer to attempt, by interference or coercion, to impair the exercise by employees of the right to form or join labor organizations, to designate representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

It shall be an unfair labor practice "for an employer to interfere with or dominate the administration of any labor organization or contribute financial support to it", with a proviso that employees may be permitted to carry on negotiations with one another or their employers on company time—that is, during working hours—without loss of pay.

It shall be an unfair labor practice "for an employer, by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment, or by contract or agreement, to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." A proviso permits the closed shop, that is, labor-union membership as a requirement of employment, when employer and employee so agree; but "nothing in this proviso shall be construed by the Board to indicate that any employer is bound to enter into an agreement conditioning employment upon membership in any labor organization."

The National Industrial Adjustment Board may ascertain and determine whether such an unfair labor practice is being indulged in, and, if the decision is in the affirmative, may make application to the courts for an appropriate restraining order.

EMPLOYEE REPRESENTATIVES

The Board has another important function. When a dispute arises, as is now so frequent, as to who are the representatives of the employees with whom the employer is required to deal for the purpose of collective bargaining, the Board may undertake to determine this question and to certify to the employer the names of individuals or labor organizations that have been designated and authorized to represent employees by not less than a majority.

This new bill doubtless will have critics who will complain that it does not go far enough and that it will not insure industrial peace. It will be for the Congress and the country to say whether half a loaf is preferred to no bread. The whole loaf, namely, the creation of a governmental instrumentality which would be able to insure and guarantee and enforce industrial peace by outlawing all strikes and by arbitrary determination of every sort and kind of labor dispute, is the dream of the idealist but utterly impossible of actual attainment under a democratic form of government. Neither employers nor employees are willing to accept the principle of involuntary arbitration. No employee can be compelled to render labor or service, and the employer has corresponding rights that are inalienable.

RECIPROCAL-TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. GORE obtained the floor.

(Several matters of routine business were presented, which appear under the appropriate headings.)

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I was wondering whether these routine matters could not be presented later in the day when we are not speaking under such a rigorous time limitation?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the unanimous-consent agreement entered into last Friday supersede the one which we were operating under prior thereto?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does until 12 o'clock today.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does it take the place of the limitation of 1 hour under which we were previously operating?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does so.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that any Senator who gets the floor may occupy it until 12 o'clock, when the later limitation comes into effect?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not examined the unanimous consent agreement, but it was the impression of the Chair at the time it was made—the Chair thinks it is in writing—that there were to be 2 hours general debate from 10 o'clock until 12 o'clock, at which time the Senate was to vote upon what is known as the "Johnson amendment" and other agricultural amendments, and that the Senate was to consider other amendments after that under a 10-minute limitation. If the Chair is not interpreting the agreement properly, he hopes that some Senator will call his attention to it.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, during the 2 hours until 12 o'clock the hour's limitation on the agricultural amendments under which we were operating last week does not apply?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the interpretation which the Chair places upon the agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GORE. I am afraid we are going to waste the 2 hours in trying to find out what is meant by the unanimous consent agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will take just an instant. It is unfortunate, Mr. President, if the 2 hours that are given to this debate are to be taken wholly by one side. Not only is it unfortunate, sir, but it is unfair. If there is any way in which, under our parliamentary rules, the time may be apportioned, I think it ought to be done in fairness.

I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who, I understand, desires to be heard upon the subject matter, and to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who has recognition at the present time, that there ought to be some arrangement by which all the time under the unanimous-consent agreement shall not be utilized by the one side. Personally, I am rather indifferent. I should like 10 minutes at some time on the amendment, because it is mine, in order that I may close the debate, if it be possible. If it is not, we can eliminate that element.

But there are others as well who want to be heard. After we have agreed to the unanimous-consent plan and after we have proceeded to cooperate with the other side of the Chamber in the passage of the bill or in its determination today, it ought not to be that the period of 2 hours only should be utilized by the one side and no part of it given to the other side.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Oklahoma permit the Chair to make a statement?

Mr. GORE. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had a request last Friday from the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to be recognized. He had a similar request from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and likewise from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], he being a member of the committee. This morning the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] came to the Chair and requested to be put on the list of those to be recognized.

The Chair thought he should make that statement so that Senators occupying or taking the floor may take note if they desire to shorten their remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I suggest that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma, which I assume will not occupy the 2 hours, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] might be recognized to proceed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I asked the question in the best of faith in the hope that we might in some manner determine the situation. Is there any objection to that mode of procedure?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as we are operating under a time limit and as other Senators desire to be heard, I shall try to abbreviate my remarks.

The pending measure does two things. It empowers the President to enter into trade treaties or agreements without submitting those agreements to the Senate for ratification. It also empowers the President to raise or reduce existing tariff duties as much as 50 percent. The measure gives rise to two sets of most interesting questions, one of them constitutional in character, the other economic. I shall address myself for the most part to the economic phases of the subject.

Mr. President, the object of the measure is to revive and promote our international trade. With that object I am in most hearty accord. As to the means proposed for effectuating that end, I find a question mark in my mind. But, Mr. President, there is no question mark in my mind as to the desirability of reviving and promoting our foreign commerce. There is no doubt in my mind as to the necessity of reviving our foreign commerce in order to facilitate recovery and in order to restore prosperity. I have often said and I now repeat that we must trade our way out of this trouble. There is no other way out. I may say if that be not the only way it certainly is the best way, and no other plan, no other scheme or schemes, will succeed without it.

We cannot tax our way out of this trouble. We have tried to balance the Budget. We have heaped taxes upon taxes like Pelion upon Ossa. I have more faith in trade than I have in taxes.

We cannot borrow our way out of debt or out of this depression. We have borrowed billions upon billions. We have added ten billions to our public debt and we will add half as many more. Trading will go further than borrowing.

We cannot spend our way out of hard times. In 1860 the total cost of our National Government was only $60,000,000 a year. In January this year we expended more than $30,000,000 a day. One Senator has estimated that in January more than 50,000,000 people were directly or indirectly eating out of the Public Treasury. That means eating out of the taxpayers' pocketbooks. That cannot go on. That cannot last. I have more faith in trading than I have in spending or lending.

Mr. President, we cannot end want by destroying wealth.

We cannot, by destroying wealth, either escape poverty or restore prosperity. We can enhance values by destroying wealth. We could destroy half of a given commodity and more than double the value of the remaining half. But we cannot feed the hungry with a decimal point or clothe the naked with dollar marks. Mr. President, until every hungry mouth is fed, until every naked back is clothed, I cannot commit myself unreservedly to a program of destruction, to a program of scarcity, even though the A.A.A. be reenforced by the drought, be aided and abetted by the drought.

I think that even the farmers must hope that this policy of experiment and expedient must be a policy of the passing hour.

Mr. President, I am reminded of the sentiments of a farmer's wife, expressed in the Saturday Evening Post. She said that she wondered how many of those who were so gaily destroying the pigs of the country had spent zero nights in the farrowing shed trying to nurse the baby pigs into life. She wondered how many of them had milked the cows in the barnyard with nothing but a barbed-wire fence between them and the winter's blast. She said that when she looked into the faces of her children and looked into the face of the future it was little wonder that a few teardrops should fall into the dishwater.

Mr. President, these experiments and expedients may have done much; they may do more; but, sir, much remains to be conquered still.

I know there is one school of thought which attaches greater faith to monetary legislation, to monetary reforms, to inflation or reflation, to an increase of the currency, than to an increase of commerce. For my part, I put more faith in the increase of commerce, because, whether the dollar be big or little, the unemployed must have some way to get his hands on the dollar. He can do that if we revive commerce, which means the revival of business, which means the revival of employment.

Mr. President, I know there are those who think that domestic commerce is a blessing, that foreign commerce is a curse. I believe that both are blessings. They are the two parts of one whole. There are those who think that we ought to encourage domestic industry, but that we ought to discourage foreign commerce. Such efforts defeat each other. Neither should be injured. Both are essential to recovery. Both are indispensable to prosperity.

Mr. President, what is trade? Trade is little more than barter; barter is little less than trade; but trade, like barter, is the process by which two men get what both men want, each parting with what he does not need, and both profiting by what neither loses. The blessings of trade are reciprocal. Its benefits are mutual—as the darkey would say, "Mutual on both sides."

Mr. President, if I may be pardoned a personal reference, I am the more committed to trade because the platform on which I was last elected contained but six words:

Less taxes, more trade, no trusts.

Six words and three promises. I have tried to keep those promises in good faith. I still think they point the way out. Less taxes would lighten our burdens. More trade would increase our strength, the equivalent of reducing our burden. Let me say in passing that we are often reminded of the forgotten man. If I were called upon to identify the forgotten man, I should point out the taxpayer. I sometimes feel, I sometimes fear, that he is the foresaken man, bleeding at every pore.

When the first club-footed savage who could neither fish nor fight turned his hand to making arrowheads and exchanged them for fish and furs, trade was under way. He was both a manufacturer and a merchant.

Someone has said that when the first cave man took a quarter of a dinosaur on his back and trekked across the veldt and exchanged it for the hide of a saber-toothed tiger intertribal trade, international trade was born then and there. I might add that all the argosies of all the ages were implicit in that simple transaction.

When we look back through the centuries, if we may take a leaf or learn a lesson from history, we see that the great trading nations as a rule have led in point of wealth, progress, prosperity, and civilization. That is true from the Phoenicians, the Carthaginians, and the Athenians, who, I might say, shine like bright particular stars in the dusk of antiquity; and, to pursue the figure, the morning star which marked the end of the Dark Ages was the rise of the Hanseatic League in the north and the trading Republics of Italy in the south. They covered the known seas with their sails, and with the caravans of the east they carried commerce from the rising to the setting sun.

In 1453 Constantinople was captured by the Turks. That divided the trade between the east and the west; it destroyed the trade of the ages, and the sun of the Italian States set at high noon. So great was the trading instinct, the trading urge, that within 50 years from the fall of Constantinople Columbus had discovered America, and Vasco de Gama had doubled the Cape of Good Hope and had anchored his ships in the ports of India.

The mariner's compass had conquered the seven seas. Then rose a succession of great commercial States—Portugal, Spain, Holland—but as their trade declined their glory departed.

The two great trading countries of modern times have been the United States and the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom has led in point of imports; the United States in point of exports. Last year—last year, for the first time since the outbreak of the World War—Great Britain led the United States in the value of exports. Last year the United States took second place in respect of exports.

World trade has, of course, suffered a terrific crash since the panic of 1929. During that year the aggregated imports of all countries amounted to more than thirty-five billions. Last year they sank below twelve billions. Foreign commerce, in point of volume, has shrunk 50 percent. In point of value it has shrunk 66⅔ percent.

Great as has been the shrinkage of world commerce, our own commerce has shrunk even more. Last year our foreign commerce, measured in terms of gold, was 75 percent less than it was in 1929. In 1933 world commerce was 13 percent less than in 1932, notwithstanding all our signs and proofs of improvement; but our own commerce in 1933, measured in terms of gold, was 19 percent less than it was in 1932. That does not reflect progress. Our commerce last year, including imports and exports, was three and a half billion dollars less than it was in 1929.

That brings me to this point:

There are those who insist that it is domestic commerce that counts, and that foreign commerce is of no concern. They say that our foreign commerce is only 10 percent of our domestic commerce, and they say that with an air of mathematical certainty and finality, as if it ended the discussion. They seem to inquire, "Why trifle with trifles?"

Mr. President, averages have their proper place in statistics, but they sometimes conceal the truth instead of revealing it. Let me illustrate:

Henry Ford and I, taken together, have an aggregate wealth of $1,000,000,000. We have, on the average, a half billion dollars apiece. That average is mathematically exact. The only trouble is, he has all of the billion, and I have all of nothing. You see my point.

Now, let us look through this glittering generalization about 10 percent and see what are the cold and naked facts back of that generalization.

Take the Cotton Belt, so ably represented by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. We have 10 or 12 States engaged in producing cotton. At times they have grown 66 percent of all the cotton grown upon the globe. Cotton constitutes more than one-fifth of all our exports. Their economic structure, their economic life, is built upon that staple. Their prosperity is bound up in cotton. They export more than one-half of all their cotton. They export from 55 to 60 percent of all the cotton they grow. Their prosperity depends upon a foreign market for their surplus. The prosperity of the industrial States of the North is bound up in the prosperity of the cotton States of the South.

Those Northern States must find an outlet for their manufactured goods in the markets of the South; and, in turn, that means that their prosperity depends upon foreign markets for cotton. The North and the South have a common interest in a foreign market for six or seven million bales. From 1929 to 1933 the value of our raw cotton exported shrank 48 percent and cotton manufactures shrank 71 percent.

Take the Corn Belt: Our farmers sell their corn not on the cob but on the hoof. We export 40 percent of all our packing-house lard, more than 600,000,000 pounds a year. The prosperity of the Corn Belt is bound up in foreign markets for their surplus pork and lard. The value of our lard exports between 1929 and 1933 shrank 68 percent.

The industrial States of the East must find an outlet for their goods in the markets of the West, and they are as much concerned in foreign markets for surplus pork and lard as are the farmers of the Corn Belt themselves. The North and the South have a joint and several interest in foreign markets for our surplus pork and lard.

Germany has recently raised her tariff on lard from 65 cents a hundred pounds to $18 a hundred pounds—$18 a hundred pounds! Apparently they believe in protection, and they evidently intend that their tariff duties shall at least cover the difference between the costs of production at home and abroad.

The prosperity of the Wheat Belt is bound up in wheat. The prosperity of the Wheat Belt depends upon foreign markets for our surplus wheat. We used to export in the form of wheat or flour 25 percent of our entire production of wheat. Our exports of wheat have declined 90 percent. For days and weeks and months past our exports of wheat have amounted to zero.

I checked the market letters, and for week after week we exported not a single bushel of wheat. Is it any wonder that our wheat farmers are distressed? The Eastern States must find a market in the western wheat States for a part of their goods. They are therefore as dependent upon foreign markets as are the wheat farmers themselves. The interests of the East and the West in foreign markets are inseparable, are identical.

Why has wheat declined so much? I digress for a moment to state what I believe affords a contributing cause. In the early and middle twenties the Canadian wheat farmers organized wheat pools. Our farmers organized cooperative movements of a similar sort. The Canadian wheat farmers proclaimed to the world that through their pools they intended to fix the price and to peg the price of wheat at $2 a bushel. What happened in the wheat-producing countries? They took the Canadian farmers seriously. Canada, Australia, the Argentine, and even the United States, increased their wheat acreage, increased their output of wheat, desired to get in on the $2-a-bushel price, desired to reap a share of this golden harvest.

But what happened in the wheat-importing countries? They took or mistook the Canadian promise as a threat. They thought that if they had to buy their bread at the rate of $2 a bushel for wheat they would better raise their own wheat at home instead of buying their bread abroad. They increased their acreage. They increased their output, they plugged the market, and the wheat farmers of the world can bear witness to the tragic result.

Were not both those reactions perfectly natural? Were they not the very things to be expected? Perhaps it was an unforeseen effect; perhaps it was an unplanned by-product of planned economy.

Mr. President, that is one reason why I have so little faith in artificial contrivances to deal with economic facts and with economic forces. They—

> Gang aft a-gley;
> And leave us naught but grief and pain
> For promised joy.

I speak of those movements with perfect candor because I am more anxious to serve the farmers than to please them, although I am anxious to do both.

Take the tobacco States. They export 40 percent of their tobacco products. Their prosperity depends upon foreign markets for their surplus tobacco, and the industrial States in other quarters of the country, which must find an outlet in the markets of the tobacco States, are equally dependent for their prosperity upon foreign markets for tobacco. When you reduce our foreign markets for tobacco you reduce the home market in our tobacco States for our domestic manufactures. From 1929 to 1933 the value of our tobacco exports shriveled 43 percent. Shall I say 43 percent went up in smoke?

Mr. President, this is not a farm problem alone. It concerns the laborer as well as the farmer. In good times two and a half million families among our wage earners owe their employment and their living to foreign commerce. One million men are out of employment today who in better times earned their daily bread in connection with foreign commerce. This problem concerns industry as well as agriculture. It concerns our great industries which sell a surplus abroad, and it likewise concerns our great industries which sell no surplus abroad, but which depend upon domestic markets, which, in turn, depend upon foreign markets.

In 1929 we exported more than $541,000,000 worth of automobiles. In 1933 that amount had shrunk to $90,630,000 worth, or 83 percent. Our automobiles must find foreign markets if their manufacturers are to prosper.

In 1929 we exported more than $560,000,000 worth of petroleum and its products. That has shrunk in value to $200,000,000, or 64 percent. The petroleum business, the third largest in the country, depends, like agriculture, upon foreign markets for its prosperity.

In 1929 we exported more than $606,000,000 worth of machinery. In 1933 it dropped to $132,528,000. In 1930, a bad year in itself, we exported $516,000,000 worth of machinery, more than a half billion dollars' worth of machinery. For the first time in a hundred years cotton took second place on our list of exports; machinery took first place. That fact has ominous implications. There needs no Daniel come to judgment to read the mystic legend or to teach us the portentous lesson.

Carlyle said that "gunpowder made all men the same height." May not automatic machinery, may not improved machinery, make all men equal in economic stature? If it does, may we not today be facing a social and an industrial revolution that is fundamental alike in its character and in its consequences? I do not like to contemplate it; I would like to avert it.

Mr. President, let me give these significant statistics. In 1921, a bad year, our exports of crude foodstuffs amounted to $673,000,000. Eight years later, in 1929, the peak of the boom, our exports of crude foodstuffs had shrunk to $270,000,000, a shrinkage of 60 percent during that period of real or phosphorescent prosperity.

In 1933 our exports of crude foodstuffs had shrunk to $48,000,000, only one-fourteenth of our exports in 1921. Does anyone wonder why our farmers are distressed?

Let me point out the comparison. From 1921 to 1933 our exports of semimanufactured products shrank 42 percent. Our exports of finished products shrank 62 percent. Our exports of crude foodstuffs shrank 93 percent.

Mr. President, we cannot revive prosperity in this country until we can regain and reopen foreign markets for our surplus farm products. There is not any other way out of this dilemma. We cannot restore prosperity to our great industries which depend upon foreign markets until we regain their foreign markets. We cannot restore prosperity to our great industries which have no exports themselves, but which depend upon domestic markets, which in turn depend on foreign markets, until we can regain and reopen these foreign markets. You might as well say that the dome of this Capitol is supported by the roof of the Capitol instead of by the foundations of the Capitol, as to say that those nonexporting industries do not depend upon foreign markets.

Mr. President, let me state the position which our farmers held in our national economic structure. The farmers and their families constitute one-third of our entire population, and prior to the panic our farmers owned one-fifth of our national wealth—more than the capital invested in all the mines and all the mills and all the railroads combined. Our farmers created one-sixth of our national income. They produced one-half of the raw material which gave employment to our wage earners.

They produced one-half of all our exports. They paid one-fifth of all our taxes. They furnished one-eighth of all the tonnage carried by the railroads. They bought one-tenth of all the goods manufactured by all our industrial establishments in the whole country.

Our farmers were the largest single group of consumers. When their purchasing power vanished the prosperity of industry and of agriculture vanished with it. They departed hand in hand. We have got to bring that prosperity back to the farm. We have got to open foreign markets for our surplus farm products in order to restore prosperity either to the farmer or to those who produce goods or render services in behalf of the farmer.

As I understand, the efforts of the administration, the efforts of the A.A.A., have been directed toward the restoration or the revival of the purchasing power of our farmer. We must raise the price of what he sells more rapidly than we raise the price of what he buys, otherwise we have not restored the balance between agriculture and industry. I have always doubted whether the processing tax alone would restore that balance.

I have always doubted whether the processing tax alone would restore either the purchasing power or the prosperity of our farmers. Even if we take a billion dollars out of the pockets of the consumers and transfer it to the pockets of the producers, I have always doubted whether our consumers with their purchasing power diminished $1,000,000,000 would or could continue to buy an equal quantity of farm produce, paying an additional billion dollars into the bargain. What our farmers need is wider and better markets—not bigger and heavier taxes, not bigger and heavier debts.

Let me mention a byproduct of this processing tax in my own State. We have about a dozen small packing houses in Oklahoma, local, of course, in their service, providing a limited outlet for the farmers in their neighborhood, but competing more or less with the big concerns which have their plants in Oklahoma City. I am advised, and I believe reliably advised, that the processing tax will destroy each and every one of these little independent packing houses, and leave the field open to the domination of the big concerns. That is another unplanned byproduct of planned economy. Perhaps I have less faith in planned economy than it deserves. It presupposes too much. It presupposes omniscience. Few men are all-wise. It presupposes omnipotence. Few men are almighty. In order to establish planned economy, we must know the unknowable. In order to carry it out, we must control the uncontrollable. They who attempt impossibilities ought to calculate on a certain percentage of failures.

Mr. President, how are we to reopen foreign markets for our surplus farm products? There is only one way. In order to reopen foreign markets to our surplus farm products, we must to some extent reopen our own markets to foreign goods. In the last analysis international trade is nothing more nor less than the exchange of goods, than the exchange of surpluses. We must arrange to swap surpluses. International trade is not and cannot be made a one-way track. When we close our gates to keep imports out, we close our gates to keep exports in—to keep cotton and wheat and pork and lard and petroleum and automobiles within our gates.

We cannot sell our surplus farm products in foreign markets unless we in turn buy goods in foreign markets. There is no other way. Exports are exchanged for imports. Imports are the only legal tender in the long run for our exports. We cannot sell our farm products abroad unless we buy foreign products in foreign markets. We cannot sell unless we buy. Foreigners cannot buy from us unless we buy from them. There is no escape from that dilemma.

Our exports can be paid for in only one of two ways, theoretically. The foreigner must pay us with gold or he must pay us with goods. He does not have the gold with which to buy our goods, and if he had be would probably emulate our example and lay an embargo upon his gold. The foreigner must pay for our goods with his goods. I repeat, that in the long run there is no other way to effectuate such an exchange of surpluses.

We tried the different schemes. From 1922 to 1929 our exports exceeded our imports by five and one-half billion dollars. It looked like prosperity. But, Mr. President, we lent the foreigner the money with which to pay for those exports. The foreigner borrowed our money to buy our goods, and the trouble is he borrowed more than he bought. He borrowed more than $8,000,000,000 and bought less than $6,000,000,000. But we lent him the money with which to buy. That scheme, however, was bound to fail. It could not succeed.

Now, I think, no one will rely upon our lending the foreigner money in the future with which to buy our surplus goods.

That brings us back to this point. If we desire to sell our surplus goods abroad we must buy the surplus of the foreigner in foreign markets. What we produce and do not need we must exchange for what others produce and do not need. We must exchange what we have and do not want for what we want and do not have. It is not a matter of choice. That is the only way; and the pity of it is, the way is not subject to our command or control. It now takes an arrangement to do it.

We have increased our duties from time to time. Foreigners have increased their tariffs, their quotas, their embargoes, their prohibitions; they have manipulated foreign exchanges in order to protect their gold and to protect their markets. Whether that was done through retaliation or not does not now concern us. Whether it was offensive or defensive is not the point. It has come to pass that we must prevail upon the foreigner to relax his restrictions against our exports, and in order to do that we may be obliged to relax our restrictions against his exports to this country. The barriers that have gone up together may have to come down—barrier for barrier.

It will be said: Where will the concessions be made? We have more than 1,000 articles on our dutiable list today of which we import less than 5 percent of our domestic production. There is some room for concessions.

Here is another point that should not be overlooked. The Smoot tariff measure—and I do not mean to rouse the sleeping tiger of partisan controversy—was passed by the friends of high protection. I assume that the rates in that measure were as high as they ought to have been. Many of those duties were specific not ad valorem—specific—so much per yard, per pound, per gallon. Some of those commodities have shrunk in value as much as 50 percent. That means that these specific duties have increased automatically 100 percent, and in some instances they have increased 200 percent. There is some room for reduction.

Not only that but the devaluation and depreciation of our dollar amount to an increase in the tariff rates of nearly 70 percent—70 percent pyramided upon duties which were high enough when enacted, a 70-percent increase against the countries remaining on the gold standard. This advantage, real or imaginary, has been canceled out, of course, correspondingly by other countries whose currencies have depreciated. This provides some room, let us hope, for relaxation of trade restrictions which will permit the foreigner to sell some of his goods here in exchange for our cotton, our wheat, our lard, our petroleum, and our automobiles.

Mr. President, that brings me to this point: There are those in this country—and I think they are to be found pretty much in all parties—who insist that our tariff duties must be high enough to cover the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. I am not partisan at all when I say that the Republicans inserted that in their platform as far back as 1908. They have an original copyright on that policy. In 1932 the Democrats pilfered that policy.

In 1932, camping where the Republicans had camped 24 years before, we proclaimed that we were in favor of a competitive tariff. I suppose this means tariff duties high enough to cover the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. Mr. President, that is a specious theory; it is not sound economics. It may be good politics, but it is not good sense. It may be good politics, if unsound economics is ever good politics. It is a sort of lullaby; it croons fear to sleep and protects our politicians against the wrath of the protected interests that might resent a more positive statement of principle.

Mr. President, the declaration in favor of a tariff high enough to cover the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad is not only an economic fallacy but it is an impossible standard; it cannot be applied. When I say that I am not partisan. I will have the clerk read a question which I asked the Republican chairman of the Tariff Commission and his answer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows from page 147, hearings on House bill 8687:

Senator GORE. Let me ask you right there—I judge from what you said, that the cost-of-production theory, in your judgment, is not possible of application, even if it were desirable, and it would not be desirable, even if it were possible?

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is exactly my view.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in another place the Chairman of the Tariff Commission exposes the fallacy of the whole theory, and I will insert that in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the extract will be inserted in the RECORD.

The extract is as follows:

Mr. O'BRIEN. Well, the notion that you can obtain costs of production; the notion that you ought to obtain them; the notion that tariffs between countries should rest upon differences in costs of production, even if omniscience should give us the power to determine them, is all wrong (tariff hearings, pp. 143–144).

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the cost of producing a given article varies in every country on the globe where it is produced. The cost of producing a given article varies in every establishment in a given country. The cost of producing an article in a given establishment varies from time to time in the same establishment. It is an utterly impossible standard; and, if it were possible, would you adopt the cost of the most efficient plant or of the most inefficient as the criterion? Would you adopt the inefficient and penalize the efficient, or would you adopt the efficient and pension the inefficient?

Mr. President, if the cost of production standard were possible it would not be desirable, because it ignores the very taproot of all trade and commerce. People trade for two reasons; either to get something which they cannot produce at all or to get something which somebody else can produce cheaper than can they themselves; and the cheapness need not be absolute; it need be only relative or comparative. International trade, like individual trade, depends not upon absolute difference in cost, but in the comparative difference in cost. Because it costs more in some other country to produce a given article than it costs us is no reason why we should not buy that article from the foreigner. Let me illustrate: Suppose that A in 1 week's time can produce 2 cords of wood or 2 hats or 2 pairs of shoes, and suppose that B in the same week can produce 3 cords of wood or 4 hats or 6 pairs of shoes. B can produce wood at a less cost than A but it would not pay him to produce wood; he would better devote his week to producing 6 pairs of shoes and exchange 4 pairs of shoes with A for 3 cords of wood. A ought not to devote his week to producing 2 pairs of shoes; he ought to produce 2 cords of wood and exchange them with B for 3 pairs of shoes. He would have an extra pair of shoes into the bargain or the money, which he could spend on the purchase of "shoes and ships and sealing wax." The whole theory ignores the very fundamental taproot that gives rise to trade and commerce whether it be between individuals in the same country or between individuals in different countries, or between two countries that are foreign to each other. International trade is not trade between nations as such. It represents the total trade, the aggregate exchanges, between all the importers and all the exporters in the countries concerned.

Mr. President, I think that nationalism has gone mad. The extremes of nationalism and internationalism are equally objectionable. The war created eight new countries in Europe and 12,000 miles of additional international boundaries, every mile of which is a point of irritation, with customhouses and tariff rates bristling like bayonets along the 12,000 miles, each country desiring to become economically self-sufficient, each increasing its own productive capacity, superimposing it upon a world that was already oversupplied with productive capacity. I had hoped that the war might teach us this one lesson, that while nations are independent politically, this globe is an economic unit, and the theory of economic independence among nations is an unrealizable dream. Interdependence is a fact, and to ignore that fact but cheats us in a real effort to promote permanently a substantial recovery.

Let me say here that I think we are fortunate to have Secretary Hull at the head of the State Department. He is a true and steadfast and an undeviating friend and champion of both domestic and foreign commerce.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the constitutional features of this measure. If it undertakes to empower the President to enter into treaties without requiring them to be ratified by the Senate, there are those who think that it is unconstitutional, and I am inclined to agree. If it empowers the President to raise and reduce duties on his own motion, there are those who insist that that is a delegation of legislative power, and I am inclined to agree. I say "inclined", because I am not certain that the Supreme Court would hold that either of such grants would be an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. Since the Supreme Court has held that "thou shalt not" means "maybe", during an emergency, at least, we should not foreshadow the action of the Court upon this constitutional point.

On the 1st day of April 1932 I voted to repeal the flexible tariff provisions of our existing tariff law. I cast that vote on constitutional grounds. I voted to take that power away from President Hoover.

I voted to take that power away from a Republican President. I voted to take that power away from the President of the United States. I do not think it was unconstitutional to vest that power in a Republican President and constitutional to grant that power to a Democratic President.

In this place, I desire to state one principle of constitutional law. I wish to make it clear and certain. I state it in order that the RECORD may show, in order that "the sons of men may know."

Congress cannot delegate legislative power. Congress cannot delegate the power of legislation to any man or to any set of men. Congress cannot delegate the power of legislation to the President or to anyone else. That question is not an open question. That question has been settled. It has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. I quote from the Court's opinion in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U.S.):

> That Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of Government ordained by the Constitution.

When the Congress makes a grant of power, when the Congress delegates power to the President, this question may arise: Is the power legislative in character? If so, the grant is void. But if the power is executive, or is administrative in character, then the grant is valid if it comes within the expressed or implied powers of the Congress, or of the Government under the Constitution.

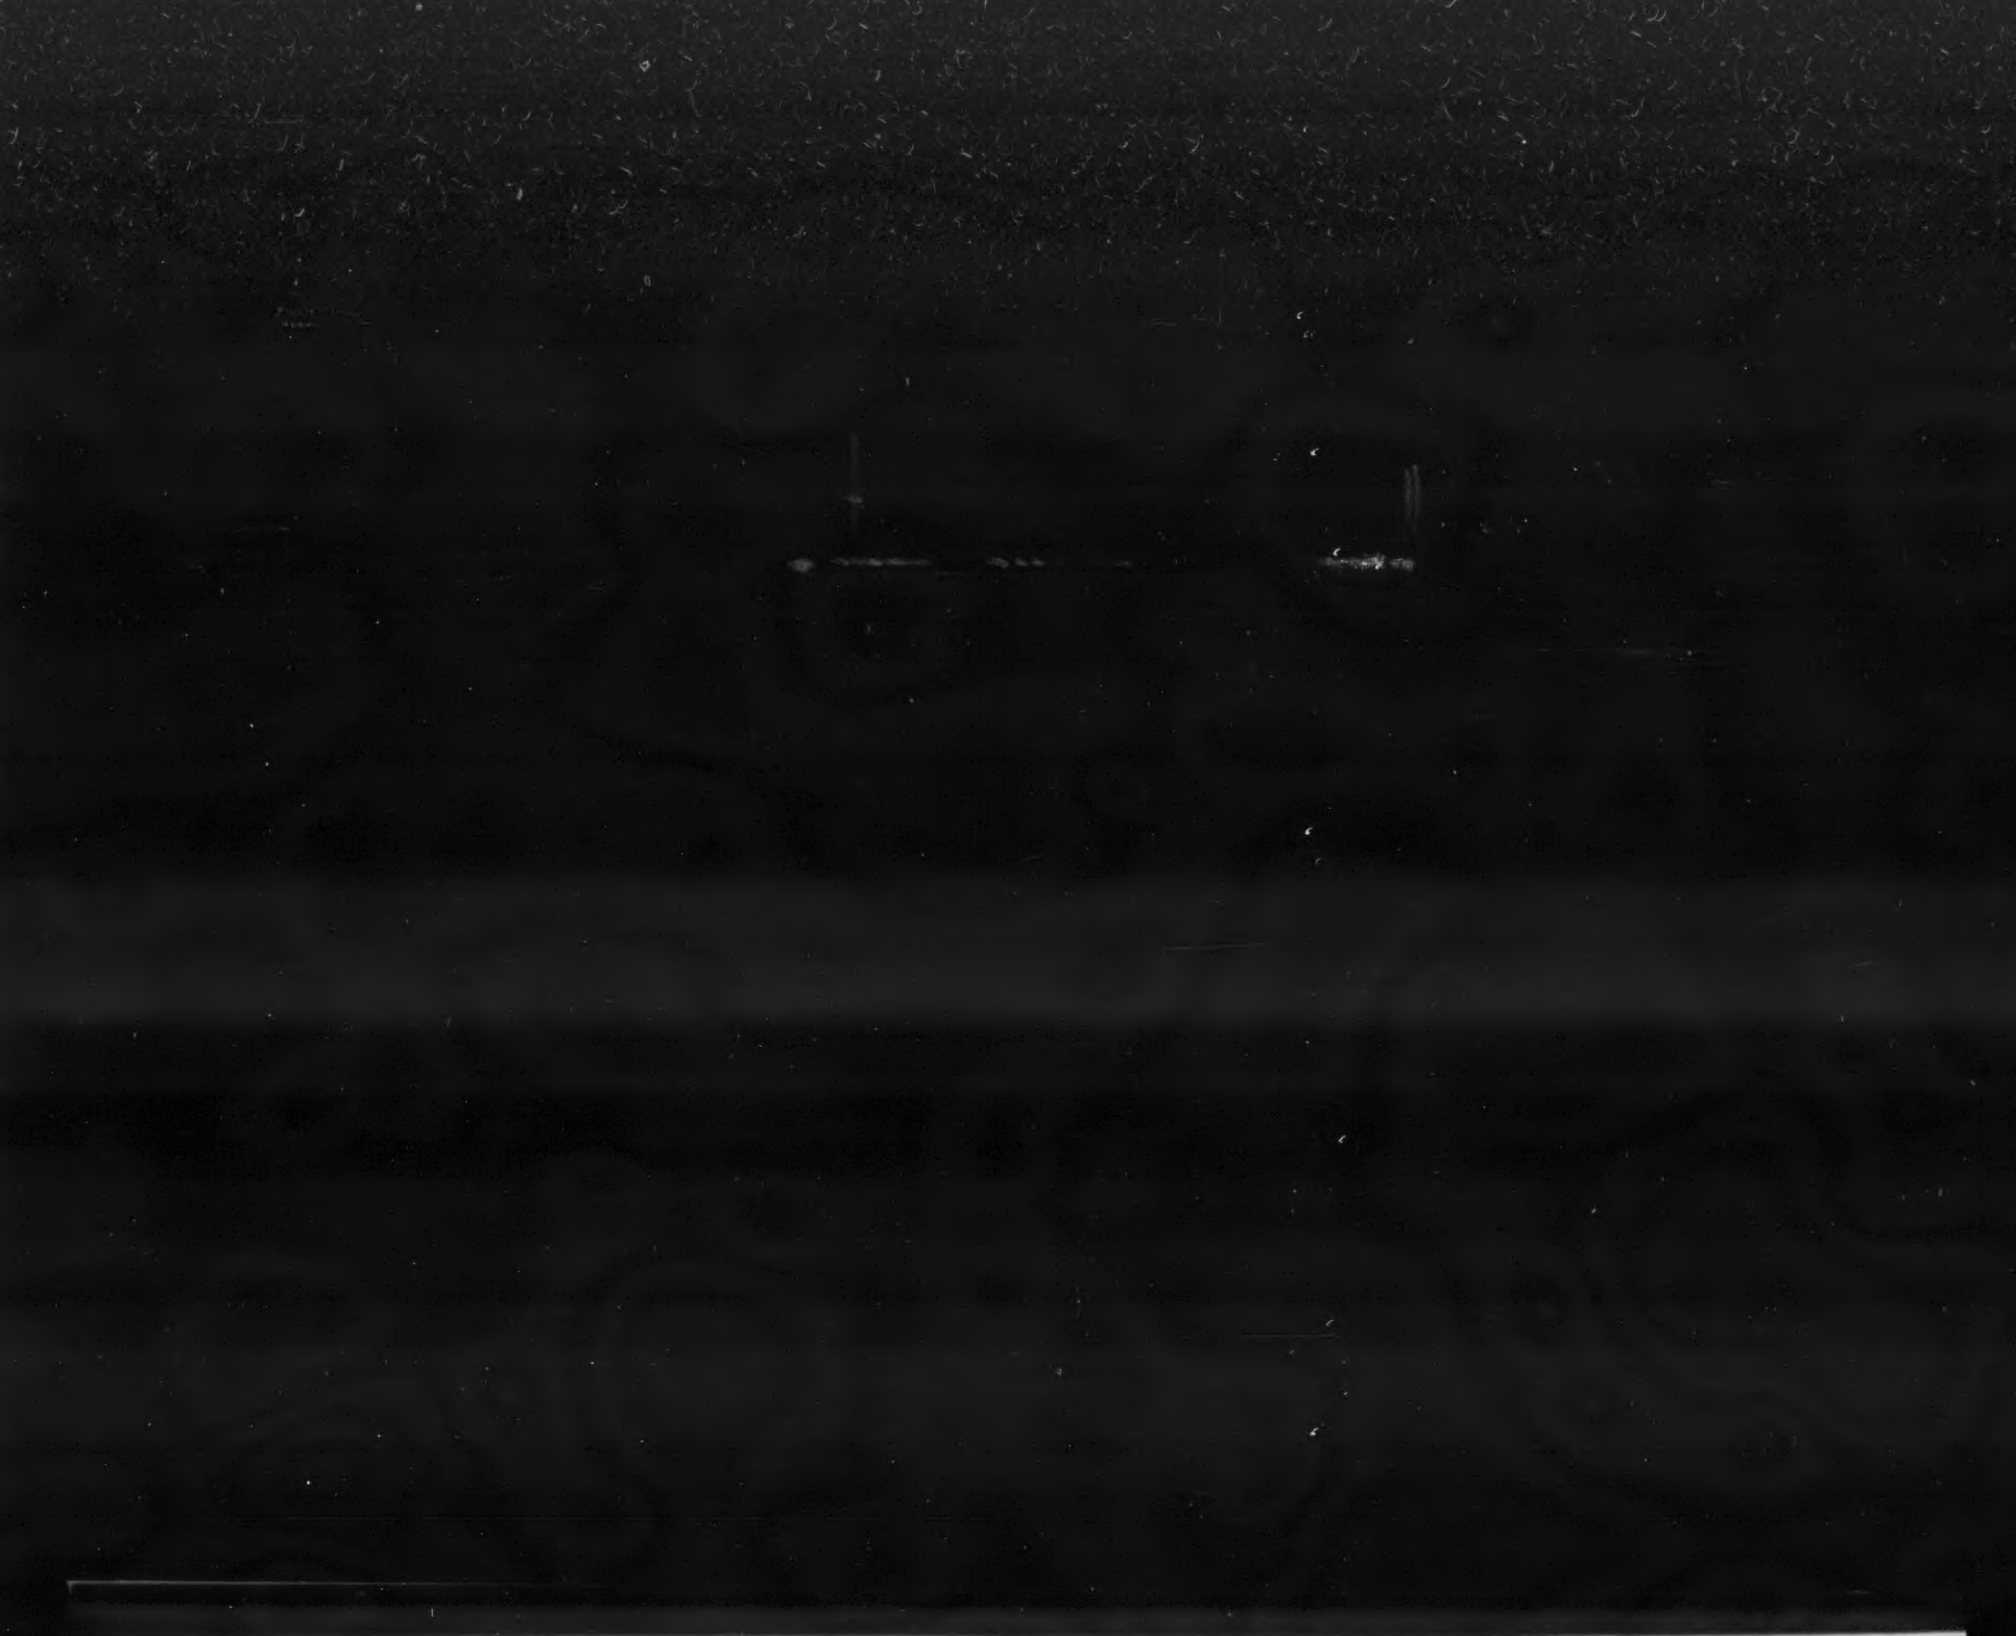
I am reminded of this. Dante describes a scene which he witnessed in Malebolge, a fierce encounter between a creature in human form and a mighty serpent. The combat was fierce and furious. The combatants inflicted deep, gaping, bleeding wounds upon each other. There came a pause in the strife. The antagonists glared at each other. A cloud fell upon them. A strange transformation took place, each creature was transfigured into the likeness of his antagonist. The serpent's tail began to divide and take the form of human limbs. The legs of the human form began to entwine and take the form of a serpent's tail. The serpent put forth arms like a man, stood up erect, and spake like a man.

The arms of the human form disappeared in its body, and it fell down upon its belly and glided hissing away into the jungle. I say this apropos of nothing. It reminds me of nothing. Nothing reminds me of it. It just seemed to me to be passing strange.

Each side can choose sides. I do not know how long it takes a Democrat or a Republican or a leopard to change his spots. I have been trying to change mine. I first tried to change the black spots to make them white, but that would not work. I am now trying to change the white spots to make them black. I am making some headway. Mr. President, I report progress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in view of the very brief time remaining I shall detain the Senate not more than 10 minutes, because I know there are other Senators who desire to be heard before we vote at 12 o'clock.



Mr. President, I rise to address the Senate for the purpose of expressing the very earnest hope that the Johnson amendment, and all other amendments for the purpose of exempting specific commodities or particular classes of goods from the operation of the bill, will be defeated. The amendment, Mr. President, is not designed to help agriculture; it is designed to kill the bill. Its adoption would be the signal and the rallying call for the offering of amendments exempting every item and every classification now covered in the tariff laws or which might be conceivably included under the tariff laws. I cannot conceive how any friend of the measure can reconcile his support of the bill itself with support of the Johnson amendment or any of the horde of amendments on other items which are sure to follow it if its adoption should be accomplished.

Mr. President, I would be the last to doubt the entire good faith or question the high ideals of that great and valuable public servant, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], for whom I entertain both affection and respect. But, I repeat, the only possible effect of the adoption of these amendments is not to aid agriculture, but to sabotage this measure. The American farmer, Mr. President, owes his present pitiable position not to insufficient protection on agricultural commodities but to too much protection on everything which the farmer has to buy.

It is a well recognized and undeniable fact that protective duties can never be effective as to any commodity of which we produce a great exportable surplus which must be sold abroad at prices regulated by world conditions. This fact was completely demonstrated when, during the dark days of the Hoover administration, with a tariff of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, wheat actually sold down to 23 cents. With the highest tariff on wheat in the history of the Nation, wheat reached the lowest levels in 400 years.

The tariff on agricultural commodities has been bait for suckers, a lure held out to induce the farmer to endure the whole iniquitous prohibitive tariff system. During the campaign of 1928 the promise was held out that a revision of the tariff would take place immediately for the sole purpose of adjusting the agricultural schedules, and then, instead, a bill was enacted into law putting added duties on nearly every item of the dutiable list, a bill which made the historic and infamous tariff of abominations which laid the foundation for the Civil War seem by comparison mild and equitable.

What has happened to the farmer is this: He has been compelled over a long period of years to buy everything which he has to buy in a protected market, paying a tariff tax—because, of course, the tariff is nothing except a tax which the American consumer has to pay—and to sell everything which he has to sell in a free market at prices regulated by world conditions. That is a process of attrition like bucking a faro bank or any other gambling game in which there is a definite percentage against the player. Neither the great John D. Rockefeller nor Henry Ford nor Andrew W. Mellon could stand it long, and it has just about broken the American farmer.

With the highest tariff rates in our entire history, we have been in the depths of the worst depression in history. Since the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill and the retaliatory tariffs and quota allotments set up by other nations, our exports have fallen from five and a quarter billion dollars to one and two-thirds billion dollars. Our favorable balance of trade since 1929 has dropped from nearly a billion dollars to about $200,000 a year; and it is significant that while all world trade has diminished, we have been far from holding our own in the diminished total, and our percentage has constantly declined. In 1932, for the first time since 1914, Great Britain's share of world trade exceeded our own.

Our foreign trade has fallen away to nearly nothing. Huge surpluses of the products of American industry and agriculture, the sale of which in foreign lands had made the prosperity of the United States, accumulated on our hands. The more food that was produced in the United States the more millions were hungry within our borders. The more gold we accumulated the more our financial structure was impaired.

I do not wish to detain the Senate at this late hour of the consideration of this most important measure with a mere theoretical dissertation on the tariff. I do desire to emphasize that the economic principles which form the fabric of this measure are such as not even honest high protectionists should find objectionable. Certainly none of my brethren on the other side of the aisle would have the hardihood to take exception to the party standing of the late President William McKinley. He was the author of the McKinley bill, and as President he signed the Dingley bill. He was the high priest of protection. Yet in the last utterance before his death, at Buffalo, with the light of another world shining on his face, he said:

> The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

Mr. President, I wish that those words, which were so true then, so much truer today, could be implanted in letters of fire in the brain and heart of every Senator as he casts his vote on this measure.

> If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

Mr. President, it seems to me to be remarkable that a proposition so logical and simple as that, powers not one whit more extensive than have heretofore been granted by the Congress and upheld by the courts—powers certainly no more extensive than those upon which President Hoover insisted, and which he forced through Congress in 1930—powers which we now seek to grant the President for the purpose of enabling him to undo as far as possible the mischief caused by a war of tariff aggression for which we as a nation must accept a large share of primary responsibility, should be assailed by charges of dictatorship and usurpation; and these frantic charges in many instances come from the very men who helped to create the situation from which we are attempting to escape.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CLARK. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator states that our foreign trade has fallen away practically to nothing. That was his statement, I believe.

Mr. CLARK. That was an exaggeration. It still amounts to a large sum of money, but a very small proportion of what it did in 1929.

Mr. BAILEY. I will make allowance for the rhetorical character of the statement; but I wish to get some light on this phase of the matter:

We measure the foreign trade in terms of dollars; and dollars, of course, relate not to volume but to price. Since the price of commodities in general has fallen, at a fair estimation, by about 60 percent in the past 5 years, if we make allowance for that loss of 60 percent in value, will it not appear that the volume of our foreign trade has been diminished in so relatively small a way that we could not, even by a rhetorical statement, assert that the trade has fallen away to nothing?

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator that I do not believe his statement is true, because the foreign trade of the United States has fallen off in a tremendous proportion, both in value and in volume; and in the diminished international trade the share of the United States has fallen off very materially. In other words, we have nothing like held our own in world trade.

Mr. BAILEY. Our share of foreign trade relatively has fallen off three points, from 13 percent to 10 percent of world trade. That was stated in the discussion here on last Friday. Let us assume, however, that the export trade of the United States was $5,000,000,000 at the peak. That is the assumption. We had a total foreign trade of $10,000,000,000; that is, exports and imports. That was about the highest we ever had, and that is the top figure. Take off 60 percent for the decline in price. Sixty percent of five billions is three billions. Three billions from five billions is two billions. If the export trade now approximates $2,000,000,000, most of the loss in the foreign trade is not the loss in volume but the loss in price.

Mr. CLARK. I am perfectly willing to agree that the percentage loss in volume has been smaller than in dollars. Those facts are all in the hearings, and I shall be glad to put them in the RECORD. I should be glad to go into that subject at this time, except that I am attempting to conclude my remarks in time to give the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] a chance to address the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. I just wished to make my point, because we ought not to discuss this matter in terms of dollars so much as we should in terms of volume.

Mr. CLARK. I perfectly agree with the Senator that the figures ought to be checked both ways; and the figures show substantially the same result either way they are checked.

Mr. President, this whole proposition seems to me to be as simple as A, B, C. By the most wanton economic aggression in all history, in a series of prohibitive tariff acts, we placed ourselves in the situation of undertaking the unheard-of economic feat of forever selling everything and buying nothing; in short, of attempting to pull ourselves up by our own boot straps. We properly demanded the payment of just debts owed us by other nations, and then, having nearly cornered the gold supply of the world, we refused our debtor nations the opportunity to pay us in the only medium of exchange they possessed—in goods and commodities. The Hoover-Grundy bill was the last straw, which brought swift retaliation from every nation in the world, shut the nations of the world in airtight compartments, and paralyzed world trade.

As the leading exporting nation of the world—a nation which produces huge exportable surpluses, both of manufactured articles and agricultural products—we were the chief sufferers. We have been "hoist on our own petard." By our own action in forcing every other nation into a system of prohibitive tariffs and quota allotments we have shut out American farm products and American manufactured goods from the markets of the world. The difference between being admitted to these markets and being excluded from them has meant the difference between prosperity and bankruptcy to the American farmer, the American manufacturer, and the American laboring man.

Let me say, Mr. President, that whatever may be the general theoretical view of any man or woman upon the general subject of tariffs, all reasonable and practical legislators realize that changes of peculiar violence are to be avoided. When a man has been foolish enough to climb the face of an unscalable cliff he cannot successfully undo his folly by leaping at once to his starting point. However we may view the present tariff situation from a theoretical viewpoint, all must realize that we must retrace gradually the steps by which the present disaster has been created. The primary necessity of the world now is to make a start on unraveling the snarl into which all economic affairs have fallen; and this necessity is the more vital for us because other nations are already, and have for several years been, taking steps to improve their own international trade relations, while we have remained aloof and suffering the bitter effects of that aloofness. If, however, our international trade is to be restored, if we are to be given a chance to dispose of our surpluses, the sale of which has led the way out of every depression which this country has ever known, unless we desire to build another Chinese wall about the United States and live entirely within ourselves, some such measure as the pending bill must be enacted into law.

So far as I am concerned, I wish the condition which has been created could be cured by simple acts of Congress which could be signed by the President reducing the extortionate tariff rates which lie at the root of so much of our troubles; but, having by our own stupendous folly deliberately created the present deplorable situation, we now find ourselves powerless to correct it alone. A mere reduction of our tariff taxes—for a tariff rate is as much a tax as any excise or income tax ever imposed—will not reopen the markets of the world to our products unless it brings about a reduction of the tariff and quota restrictions set up in retaliation against us by other nations.

We cannot be certain, or even confident, of reciprocal concessions without negotiation. These negotiations, both from theory and practice, cannot be conducted by the Congress, and must of necessity be carried on by the Executive. Our treaty-making process is too cumbersome to permit of its use in trade negotiation. No nation in the world in the present situation would be willing to deal with us on such terms. In the last analysis we are face to face with the proposition that if we are sincere in our desire to end the most destructive economic war in history, if we desire to undo the evil results of our own folly, we have no option save to follow the proposal of the President by authorizing him to accomplish these results through the medium of reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. President, we now come to the question not of the economic effect to be accomplished by a restoration of world trade but of the method which is being employed in this particular bill; and, if a personal reference may be pardoned, those of my colleagues who have done me the honor to pay any attention to my votes and expressions on this floor know that no Member of this body has been more jealous of the preservation of the rights and functions of the legislative branch of the Government than have I. Since I have had the privilege of serving in the Senate of the United States, I have many times opposed extraordinary grants of power by Congress to the Executive—even for purposes with which I often agreed—as being either unconstitutional or unnecessary. If I believed the present grant to be unconstitutional, or any extension of powers already granted, I should unhesitatingly vote against it, even though I have the most intense sympathy with its purposes. I do not so believe. I believe that this is a grant, both constitutional and vitally necessary, no whit more extensive than that now given the President for utterly futile purposes of retaliation under section 338 of the existing law. I believe it to be essential to the welfare of the United States. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall take great pleasure in voting for this measure, and in voting against every proposal to emasculate it and bring about dissension among its supporters.

The amendment of the Senator from California is calculated to destroy the bill. Let no one be misled. It is now a fundamental principle of warfare—exemplified in American history by two of the greatest soldiers who ever trod shoe leather, Stonewall Jackson and Nathan Bedford Forrest—that when confronted by overwhelming superiority in troops or armament, victory may yet be achieved by taking the enemy in detail instead of in mass. Such today is the strategy of the opponents of this measure. Let them but make one breach by the adoption of this amendment and they will be back on their favorite battleground, the old field for general tariff bills, where trading and logrolling and chicanery and lobbying created the condition which has led to so much misery in the world today.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should not impose myself on the Senate at this time in a discussion of this bill except for the fact that in the debate which has proceeded since we began its consideration those of us who happen to be members of the Finance Committee now, and happened to be members of it in 1929–30, have had our names bandied around on the floor of the Senate and in the newspapers as being inconsistent because we now support this measure and opposed in 1930 a measure that is claimed by the opposition to have been similar.

I have no desire to reiterate the constitutional arguments which have already been adduced in behalf of this legislation; but of all the group of men in any body and of all political parties that have no right to charge inconsistency on a proposal of this sort, that party is the Republican Party, and that group is the group which sits opposite us on the other side of the aisle of this Chamber.

It has already been shown that from 1794 down to the present time the United States, from time to time, has engaged in just such activities and such negotiations as are provided for in this bill. There has always been a difference, and there is now a difference, between a treaty negotiated by the President, which requires the approval of the Senate, and the authorization by an act of Congress for negotiating trade agreements between our country and others.

The Constitution of the United States gives the Congress the power to levy taxes. Those taxes must originate in the House of Representatives. It also gives Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign countries. The power to regulate commerce is just as complete and plenary as is the power to levy and collect taxes.

All the resolutions and acts of Congress from the beginning until now, authorizing the President to enter into negotiations or agreements with foreign nations affecting our commerce, have been predicated upon the power to regulate commerce to a greater extent than the power to levy taxes.

There is a vast difference between delegating to the President of the United States, as a bald proposition, the power to levy taxes, and delegating to him the authority, as the agent of Congress, to enter into negotiations and agreements in regulating the commerce of the United States with foreign countries.

Congress cannot regulate commerce, although the Constitution authorizes it to do so. It would be utterly impossible for Congress to pass a law fixing freight rates which should apply upon commodities and on all railroads in the United States; and because long ago Congress recognized its inability to pass legislation regulating commerce in that detailed sense, it set up the Interstate Commerce Commission as the agency of Congress to carry out the details of that regulation in which Congress has the power to engage.

It was in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce among the States that the Interstate Commerce Commission was created, that the Federal Trade Commission was created, that the Radio Commission was created, and that now a new commission, to be known as the Exchange Commission, to regulate the transactions upon the stock markets of the United States, has been created.

Just as it is impossible for Congress, by an act, to perform the administrative duties of regulating in detail commerce among the States, it is likewise impossible for Congress, by an act, to regulate in detail commerce with foreign nations.

Wherever there is need for such regulation, wherever there exists a condition which demands, in any form or to any extent, a regulation which will make it necessary to negotiate with foreign countries in a reciprocal understanding, Congress has the power and the right, and it is its duty, to set up the machinery or the agency by which its mandate may be carried into effect. The agency which we set up here is the President of the United States.

Mr. President, this is not a novel proposition. In the Tariff Act of 1890, which was passed through Congress by the political party which occupies the other side of the Chamber, the President was authorized, acting as the agent of the Congress, to enter into negotiations with foreign countries with respect to the regulation of commerce. Regulation may be brought about by quotas, or by embargoes, or by restrictions; it may likewise be brought about by the adjustment of tariff rates, which are, in a sense, taxation, but which in another sense are regulations of commerce.

In the Tariff Act of 1897, passed during the McKinley administration, Congress authorized the President to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries. In one section it provided that he might enter into those negotiations and enter into those agreements by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and in another it authorized him to do so without such ratification on the part of the Senate. It is a matter of history that operating under that tariff law, passed under McKinley, an agent was appointed by McKinley by the name of Kasson, who negotiated about seven or eight treaties with foreign nations which, under the terms of the act, had to be ratified by the Senate, and although the Republican Party had a majority in the Senate, not one of those treaties was ever ratified, because there was not a two-thirds majority to be had for ratification, although our opponents were in control of every branch of the Government. Therefore the benefits expected to flow from those reciprocal understandings were defeated.

Mr. President, that is one reason why I am opposed to providing that before any negotiations contemplated provided in this bill or any similar negotiations shall become effective they must be brought back to the Senate of the United States for ratification, because there they may either fail of ratification or the benefits to be derived may have evaporated into thin air before the Senate of the United States, in view of its history with reference to treaties, would ever take action thereon.

There are three kinds of international agreements with which we have had experience. One is a treaty in its truest sense, which must be ratified by the Senate. Another is a legislative authority upon the part of the President to negotiate a treaty or an agreement to take effect when it shall be ratified by Congress, which involves both Houses, and we have had instances of such authority. The other is the proposal we have before us authorizing the President to make agreements under certain circumstances, fixing in more or less flexible fashion a yardstick by which he is required to be guided, which agreements are not to be ratified either by the Senate or by the Congress as a whole.

Mr. President, I do not think it lies in the mouths of our opponents, therefore, to charge us with inconsistency because 4 years ago we opposed a provision in a tariff bill authorizing the President to levy taxes, for that is what it meant, without regard to any international agreement, as a one-sided, unilateral proposition to raise or lower tariff rates as a matter of taxation. I opposed that provision, and I lifted my feeble voice against it, and I would do the same now if such a proposition were before us under the same circumstances.

We are not authorizing the President, by this bill, to levy taxes; we are authorizing him, as our agent and our administrator, to enter into negotiations having in mind the enlargement of our trade with foreign nations.

We need not delude ourselves into the belief that we can remain a strong, virile, and prosperous nation and withdraw ourselves within our own shell. From the day when the Phoenicians sent their ships and their agents out over the seas and over the lands to carry their commerce to the nations of the world, until today, every great, powerful, and prosperous nation in the world has been a trading nation. In all ages and in all countries the outposts of civilization have been the outposts of commerce. Hard upon the heels of the explorer has come the commercial agent.

Our own country was discovered in 1492 because Christopher Columbus was seeking a shorter route to the markets of the world, and the greatest cementing and unifying force in the American Republic has been our interstate transactions and our commerce.

It was because of the jealousies and the friction growing out of the efforts of the original colonies to keep commerce out of their borders that our Constitutional Convention wrote into our fundamental law a provision that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the States.

The first little convention which met in Annapolis, Md., to settle the dispute between Virginia and Maryland over the navigation of the Potomac River developed into the convention which met in Philadelphia and wrote the Constitution of the United States.

The Legislature of New York passed an act forbidding the importation of firewood from Connecticut, in order to make the people of New York burn their own wood. That legislature enacted a law forbidding the importation of potatoes, parsnips, and carrots, and other vegetables from Virginia, Connecticut, Maryland, and New Jersey into the State of New York in order to make the people of New York eat their own potatoes, parsnips, and carrots.

When our forefathers met to write a constitution they had foresight enough to realize that trade, commerce, the interchange of the handiwork of man, is the forerunner of civilization and the unifying force of the world. They gave Congress power to regulate commerce instead of leaving it to the States to regulate commerce among themselves and with foreign nations.

The bill we have before us today is in furtherance of that object. It is in line with that command. It is in harmony with that authority, and it is in line with it at a time when our foreign commerce needs revival more than at any other time in the history of America.

The Secretary of Commerce under President Hoover, Mr. Lamont, a very able man, made the statement—I think it was about a year before he retired from office—that for every billion dollars of American merchandise sent into other countries 3,000,000 men were employed to produce that merchandise in the factories and the fields of the United States.

If it be true, as it is true, that our export trade has fallen from $5,240,000,000 in 1929, to a little over a billion and a half dollars in 1933, it is not a stretch of the imagination to say that at least 6,000,000 of the American workingmen who are today walking the streets in search of employment which they cannot find, are walking the streets unemployed because we have lost between three and four billion dollars in American merchandise sent to the markets of the world.

Every other nation with which we compete has already the agencies by which it can compete intensively and promptly and without delay. More than 60 of these nations have already entered into international agreements by which they further their commerce.

While our trade has fallen from a basic 100 percent in 1929 to 34 percent in 1933, our proportionate world trade has fallen to a larger extent than that of any other commercial nation in the world. So that we are not only losing in our race so far as our exports are concerned but the markets which we used to occupy are being won by our competitors, who have set up their own machinery without delay to enter into mutual reciprocal agreements with other nations of the world.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am in favor of this bill, not only because it in some measure seeks to put us upon a competitive level with our competitors, but because it puts within our power the opportunity to extend our markets so as to give employment to American labor, to bring wealth to our doors, and to resume our place of leadership among the great commercial nations of the world.

I am opposed to the amendment which is now pending, offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], because under the terms of that amendment the President of the United States could not enter into an agreement designed to furnish a market or find a market for our agricultural products without regard to the character of any reciprocal understanding or advantage that might be sought by any other nation.

Under the amendment of the Senator from California we could not enter into any agreement with any other nation by which they would take more wheat, more tobacco, more pork or beef or cotton from us in return for our taking silk or perfumes or any other commodity that they may ship to us, because the language of this amendment provides that the President shall exclude from all negotiations any agricultural products, whether they are coming in or going out.

However, I do not desire to take advantage of any technical language that may be in the Senator's amendment, because I am against all amendments to this measure, and I shall vote against any other amendment without regard to its language or to its author; for I believe one of the prime desires, one of the leading motives that prompted its sponsors, is to furnish a wider field for the exportation of American agricultural products.

I come from a tobacco State, 41 percent of whose product finds its market, if it finds a market, in foreign nations. But without regard to local conditions or State lines or boundaries, we all know that we ship more agricultural products out of our country than we ship in.

In 1933 we shipped out of the United States $398,000,000 worth of raw cotton, unmanufactured cotton.

In 1928 we exported $294,000,000 worth of crude foodstuffs, every ounce of which was agricultural.

In that same year we exported $285,000,000 worth of vegetable products grown out of the soil of the United States.

But in 1933 our exports of vegetable products had declined from $285,000,000 to $46,000,000. Our exports of crude foodstuffs declined from $294,000,000 to $48,000,000. So that our agricultural markets have declined in as large a proportion, if not a larger proportion, than have the markets for our manufactured products.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] a moment ago interrupted the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to inquire whether our decline in dollar value had been greater than our decline in volume of commerce. In line with that interrogatory, I wish to state that in 1929 we shipped 111,000,000,000 tons of American products to the markets of the world, without regard to value. But in 1933 the volume of our exports had declined from 111,000,000,000 tons to 52,000,000,000 tons; our decline in the export of our products of field and factory from 1929 to 1933 was more than 50 percent in volume.

I believe the pending measure offers an opportunity which cannot be otherwise garnered to enlarge the commerce of our country, to take advantage of world conditions, to sell more goods, to employ more men, and to bring a greater degree of prosperity to our country. No greater fallacy can entertain the mind of man than the belief that this great, growing Nation, increasing in population and in power and in productivity, can build a wall around itself so high that we cannot get out and that others cannot get in to exchange mutually and advantageously the products of the toil of our own people and those with whom we have friendly relations throughout the world.

Therefore I do not believe that this amendment or any other amendment ought to be adopted to this bill, because the only object and the only result would be to handicap and embarrass the President in the negotiations and to lay our cards on the table in advance of the negotiations, so that every nation will know how far it may go and where it must stop. We need not delude ourselves into the belief that other nations will not take advantage of that handicap, that hobbling process which we will enforce, if this amendment or any other amendment shall be added to this bill. I hope the pending amendment will be rejected; that all amendments designed to cripple the administration of the powers here conferred will be defeated, and that the bill may be speedily enacted into law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement no further debate on the so-called "agricultural amendments" is in order, and the question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. NEELY's name was called). I am authorized by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] to say that he is detained on official business in the State of West Virginia, and that were he present he would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERTON (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is unavoidably detained on account of illness. I understand that if he were present he would vote against the amendment. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote for the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and vote "nay."

Mr. WALCOTT (when his name was called). In view of the transfer made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] of his pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to my general pair, the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], I am permitted to vote. I shall let this announcement stand on all votes on this bill. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] are both necessarily absent. If those Senators were present, they would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. FESS (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. FESS. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore I will have to withdraw my vote. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 54, as follows:

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I offer the amendment heretofore submitted and intended to be proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 3, lines 16 and 17, after the word "proclamation", to insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That no agreement shall be made with any foreign government whereby tariffs or import duties on products of agriculture or horticulture shall be reduced below an amount necessary to equalize the difference in cost of production of such products in the United States with the cost of production in such foreign countries.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order on the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely want to make a statement with reference to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair regrets to state that no debate is permissible under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Chair is correct in his ruling.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am advised that were he present he would vote in the negative. Were I permitted to vote, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. OVERTON (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I understand if he were present he would vote against the amendment. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote in favor of the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce the necessary absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and beg to state that I am authorized by him to say that were he present and voting he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 46, as follows:

So Mr. LONG's amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section, to read as follows:

SEC. —. That neither this nor any other act of Congress shall hereafter be construed as directly or indirectly reducing, or authorizing the reduction of, any existing rate or rates of import duty provided by law upon any agricultural or horticultural product, including all commercial articles or materials produced therefrom by usual first continuous processings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made a while ago as to my pair, I am compelled to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. OVERTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I understand that if he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] would, if present, vote "yea" on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 53, as follows:

So Mr. JOHNSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section, to read as follows:

No foreign-trade agreement entered into under the provisions of this act shall become effective until submitted to the Congress and specifically approved by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir. I rise to debate this amendment in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that, under the unanimous-consent agreement, no amendment with regard to agriculture is debatable.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Please let the Chair state the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent agreement reads as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That when the Senate concludes its labors today it take a recess until 10 o'clock a.m. Monday, and that not later than 12 o'clock noon on Monday next the Senate proceed to vote without further debate upon the pending amendment or any other agricultural amendment that may be proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now I submit to the President pro tempore that this is not an agricultural amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say that it was not the intention of the proponent of the unanimous-consent agreement that 10 minutes should not be allowed a Senator to speak on this amendment. The prohibition of further debate was confined to the agricultural amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly.

Mr. HARRISON. This amendment, it seems to me, is of a different nature.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was in error as to the amendment placed before him. The unanimous-consent agreement applies only to agricultural amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. Correct, sir.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire to state that when this matter came up a few days earlier the reason why the words "agricultural amendment" were suggested was that at that time there were only two such amendments pending, one offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and one by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON]. I am very happy that the Chair recognizes his error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair still contends that any amendment that may be proposed dealing with agriculture is undebatable.

Mr. FESS. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I have an agricultural amendment which I wish to offer. I am wondering if the Senator from California will yield to me to offer that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator from California, in order that we may get rid of the agricultural amendments, permit the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana to be offered, and let us get through with the subject before he offers his amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; with pleasure. I will take any course that will facilitate the proceedings. My experience this morning, however, leads me to make it perfectly plain that I shall have the right to offer this amendment, and I shall have the right to debate it for a period of 10 minutes. There is no question on that score; is there?

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure that so far as I am concerned, there ought to be no question about it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no question about that; but it is in order, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to conclude the agricultural amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am glad to have that done, sir; but I do not want to get in the situation that some of our brethren here got into this morning, of having consented to the unanimous-consent agreement and then being compelled—which is something, of course, that never ought to be caused a Senator—to remain mute on the floor during any period of time; and some of us have been compelled so to remain.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I cannot agree with the Senator's last statement as a matter of argument.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is just a statement of fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not charge this debate to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair understands that the Senator from California, for the present, withdraws his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. If desired, I will withdraw the amendment until the other agricultural amendments shall have been disposed of.

Mr. OVERTON. I thank the Senator.

I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. —. Nothing in this act shall be construed to give any authority to reduce existing duties on wool and on farm products, including all basic agricultural commodities and all products processed wholly or in chief value from such basic agricultural commodities, as defined or declared in the Agricultural Adjustment Act and acts amendatory thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], I vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce the position of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], namely, that if he were present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. FESS (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has not voted.

Mr. FESS. Then I withdraw my vote for the reasons heretofore stated.

Mr. METCALF (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has not voted.

Mr. METCALF. Then I shall have to withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—36

Adams	Dickinson	Hebert	Patterson
Austin	Dill	Johnson	Schall
Barbour	Erickson	Kean	Shipstead
Borah	Frazier	Keyes	Steiwer

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which was read from the desk a brief time ago.

Mr. CLARK. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. In order that there may not be any further misunderstanding, or charges of bad faith, I desire to propound an inquiry. Under the special order adopted on last Friday, which provided that the Johnson amendment and other amendments dealing with agriculture should be disposed of without further debate after the hour of 12 o'clock today, the reception of the present amendment of the Senator from California precludes the reception of any further amendment to the bill dealing with agriculture, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not so interpret the agreement. The Chair interprets the agreement to this effect: The pending amendment not dealing with agriculture, the debate on it will be limited to 10 minutes by any Senator.

Mr. CLARK. That was not the inquiry. The point to which I was addressing myself was that under the special order the Johnson amendment and all other amendments dealing with agriculture must be disposed of immediately following the hour of 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CLARK. If the amendment of the Senator from California shall be entertained, that will preclude in the future the offering of any further amendment dealing with agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly; but the Chair will state that he would not have recognized the Senator from California to present his amendment if any other Senator had desired to offer an amendment regarding agriculture.

Mr. CLARK. I propound that inquiry simply in order that there may not be any misunderstanding in the future as to the parliamentary situation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I can assure the Senator from Missouri that there is no misunderstanding. I think I know what is in the agreement, and at the proper time I shall meet the Senator from Missouri on that issue. For the present the Chair has ruled that the Senator from California is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; but if the Senator will pardon me, there may be some other agricultural amendments to be offered, and I do not wish to cut off any Senator. So far as I am concerned, those amendments in which I was interested personally I presented. So I should prefer, if there are any other agricultural amendments to be offered, that they be presented now, in order that under the statement of the Chair, they be not ruled out.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that is the requirement of the unanimous-consent agreement, and I give notice now that if other agricultural amendments are offered a point of order will be made against them.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I contend, on the theory that I know what is in the agreement, which was entered into fairly and in the best of good faith, that if agricultural amendments are offered they do not necessarily have to be debated in chronological order. They can come at any time during the afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, Mr. President. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McNARY. I will permit the Senator to say a word.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to point out to the Senator that the agreement is that on Monday, at not later than 12 o'clock noon, "the Senate proceed to vote without further debate upon the pending amendment or any other agricultural amendment that may be proposed." So that the language of the agreement contemplates, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, that the agricultural amendments be disposed of immediately following 12 o'clock.

In all fairness, if there are other agricultural amendments to be offered, they should be presented before the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] shall be considered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, is there any objection on the part of the distinguished leader on the Democratic side to my withdrawing my amendment temporarily and permitting someone else to present an agricultural amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No. Mr. President; I have no objection to that course being pursued. If there are other agricultural amendments to be presented, now is the time to present them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall give my interpretation of this unanimous-consent agreement. I had something to do with its framing. I have attempted to treat fairly the Democratic Members of the Senate, and particularly the leader of the majority and the chairman in charge of the bill. It was suggested in private conversation and on the floor of the Senate that after the agricultural amendments had been argued and others proposed that they were not subject to debate. That is the understanding. But if later in the afternoon some agricultural amendment shall be proposed which is now on the table, there is nothing to preclude a vote on that amendment without debate. That is the plain language of the agreement. It is the plain understanding. On that I shall insist.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HEBERT. I proposed an amendment on the 10th of May last. It provides for a limitation upon the application of this bill to commodities of which at least 70 percent of the value of materials employed therein are products of the farm, ranch, or dairy. The question arises in my mind whether that is to be considered an agricultural amendment or an amendment affecting industry. I should like to have the Chair give to the Senate his version on that question at this time, so that we may know how to proceed when that amendment shall be reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would hold that such an amendment would fall under the agreement with regard to agricultural amendments.

Mr. HEBERT. I did not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would hold, if the question were submitted, that such an amendment would come under the agreement with regard to agricultural amendments.

Mr. HEBERT. May I say to the Chair that, to my mind, there was no such understanding in the unanimous-consent agreement entered into. The amendment to which I refer relates to commodities. It is true that the commodities referred to are those in which at least 70 percent of the value thereof are agricultural products. The amendment does not refer to agriculture except indirectly. The main purpose of the amendment is to protect products in industry and not in agriculture. I submit that the ruling of the Chair is not in accordance with the purposes of this bill nor in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement entered into here last Friday.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON. May it be understood that the time consumed in this discussion is not coming out of the time in relation to the amendment which I am endeavoring to offer and will ultimately offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from California has refrained from offering his amendment pending the determination of the question whether or not there is to be any other agricultural amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, that statement is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FESS. My parliamentary inquiry is, Would an amendment, if it included more than agriculture and included agriculture simply incidentally, be considered under the agreement an agricultural amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ruled that, in his opinion, the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island comes within the description of agricultural amendments in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Ohio, the original amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] included also horticultural products, so that it is perfectly clear to my mind that the ruling of the Chair is correct. The intention of the unanimous-consent agreement was to limit debate, as provided in the agreement, on amendments the primary object of which was to make an exception of commodities or materials grown on the farm. The Johnson amendment contained a provision relating to such materials. The Senator from Rhode Island may present his amendment and have it voted on. The effect of the agreement, as I interpret it, is to prevent further debate.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, if I may be permitted further, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about the purpose of the amendment which I desire to propose, let me read the first paragraph of it:

SEC. 5. (a) Commodities of which at least 70 percent of the value of the materials employed therein are products of the farm, ranch, or dairy shall be exempted from all pending or contemplated reciprocal trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof under the authority of this act.

I submit, Mr. President, that that does not have any effect upon agricultural commodities. It affects industry purely and simply. It says in effect——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I am arguing the point of order, and I contend I have the right to argue it.

Mr. HARRISON. The point of order as yet has not even been made. The Senator from Rhode Island has not as yet offered his amendment.

Mr. HEBERT. I shall offer my amendment, Mr. President, in due time. I want a ruling by the Chair. I desired to submit to the Chair my observations upon the purpose of this amendment, which I think has been misinterpreted by the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that if he wants to offer his amendment he can do so and then argue his point of order, but I submit that at the present time he is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. There is nothing before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. HEBERT. I now offer my amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 6, after line 16, to insert the following new section:

SEC. 5. (a) Commodities of which at least 70 percent of the value of the materials employed therein are products of the farm, ranch, or dairy shall be exempted from all pending or contemplated reciprocal trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof under the authority of this act.

(b) Nothing in this act shall restrict the powers of the President conferred upon him by section 3 (e) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and/or the powers to reduce or increase tariff rates conferred upon him under section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator desire to debate the amendment?

Mr. HEBERT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I raise the point of order that under the agreement the Senator cannot debate that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I want to be heard before the ruling is made by the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion on the point of order? We will likely spend more time on the point of order than will be consumed in debate. I believe we will save time if by unanimous consent we give the author of the amendment 10 minutes to discuss it. No one else, I suppose, cares to discuss it, but the author might want the time to explain it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I want to discuss the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator from Mississippi desires to permit the Senator from Rhode Island 10 minutes to explain his amendment I shall not discuss the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] be given 10 minutes in which to explain his amendment in order that we may proceed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I would have no objection in the world to the Senator from Rhode Island explaining this amendment for 10 minutes. But if similar requests are going to be made with reference to every amendment that shall be offered here we will have a request when 5 o'clock comes to carry the vote on the bill over beyond that time. So it seems to me that inasmuch as we entered into the agreement we ought to abide by it, and if the Senator feels that the Chair is wrong he can take an appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, that will take longer than 10 minutes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am as certain as I am of anything in the world that the interpretation by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is out of line with the understanding expressed in the unanimous-consent agreement, as well as the colloquy we had on Thursday of last week, and it is extremely unfair. To that point I shall address myself.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I shall not object to the unanimous-consent request that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] may speak 10 minutes on his amendment, but I serve notice that I shall object to any further violation of the agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Rhode Island has 10 minutes on his amendment.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I have already read the pertinent part of this amendment. It provides that—

Commodities of which at least 70 percent of value of the materials employed therein are products of the farm, ranch, or dairy shall be exempted from all pending or contemplated reciprocal trade agreements with foreign governments.

Let me state for the information of the Senate what the application of this amendment will be in relation to the provisions of the pending bill. In the case of cotton textiles it will apply 100 percent, of course, because the basic material out of which cotton textiles are manufactured is cotton.

In the case of wool that is equally true, unless some other material enters into the construction of the fabric, but if it be all wool, then more than 70 percent of the value of the materials entering into the fabrication of the article are farm products, and so it will be exempt from the operations of this bill.

Take the case of cotton textiles, made up in part of silk. The question would arise as to whether or not 70 percent of the content of such textiles was composed of cotton produced on the farm. In the event there was sufficient silk in the manufacture of the article to reduce the value of the cotton content below 70 percent, then the article would not be subject to the operation of this measure. Where an article is manufactured of silk and wool again the question would arise as to whether or not there was 70 percent wool content. The operation of this amendment would affect all dairy products, because, manifestly, there is nothing else in them except the products of the farm. All prepared foods would be subject to the operation of this amendment.

Mr. President, I had in mind in the formulation of this amendment more particularly the condition of the textile industry. In that connection I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a statement which was published in the public press on yesterday emanating from the Administrator of the N.R.A., General Johnson, in relation to the cotton textile industry, concerning which I know Senators are aware there was a serious condition recently. He said this:

> Including the processing tax, raw cotton costs have increased 150 percent. There has been a 70-percent increase in labor costs, due to the code and other influences, and an increase of 94 percent in cost of labor, material, and supplies in cotton textiles.

Manifestly, it would not be just to the cotton textile industry, under existing conditions, to enter into any reciprocal trade agreements which would have the effect of reducing the protection now accorded to that industry under the tariff law of 1930. I quote further from General Johnson's statement:

> A very clear cause of decreased consumption is this increased cost and increased prices which flow from it.

General Johnson realized that because of the operation of the N.R.A. the cost of cotton textiles has been materially increased and that due regard must be had to the condition of that industry at this time.

> In this situation any such increase in cost would paralyze production and employment and defeat the very ends aimed at.

I submit, Mr. President, that that is a frank statement of the situation as it exists in the cotton-textile industry at the present time. General Johnson recognizes that any increase in cost of textiles would paralyze production and employment and defeat the very ends aimed at.

He goes on to say:

> The course of negotiations has not been helped by the concurrent newspaper debate between the parties to them. Fairness to N.R.A. and to a great industry and to its accomplishments for labor under the N.R.A. compels me to correct several inaccurate statements which appeared in news dispatches yesterday and which were attributed to officials of the United Textile Workers.
> A statement that the administration of the cotton-textile code, "through lack of enforcement, has brought it to a point of pre-code conditions" is simply without foundation in fact. I know of no code under the N.R.A. that is administered more conscientiously and more effectively than this code has been and is being administered by its code authority.
> The statement that wages "have been forced down to lower than ever before" is equally unfounded. The very opposite is true. The record shows that the present hourly wage rate as well as weekly earnings adjusted to living costs (real wages) have reached and passed the highest 1929 level.

Mr. President, I submit that any industry which merits such encomium from the Director of the N.R.A. is entitled to all the protection that it is possible for the Congress to accord to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator appreciate that if his amendment should be adopted, first there would have to be ascertained whether 70 percent of the value of the materials employed therein are products of the farm, ranch, or dairy, and that it would therefore take an indefinite period to ascertain that fact; and so the amendment would destroy the effect of what we are trying to do?

Mr. HEBERT. I know that argument has been advanced many times.

Mr. HARRISON. It is a good argument.

Mr. HEBERT. It has been advanced in the case of the operations of the present Tariff Commission. I concede that there is some difficulty involved in establishing those costs, but it is not impossible; and I venture to say that if the Tariff Commission had functioned as it was anticipated by the Congress it would function, we should have had much better results from its operations than we have had.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield for a question?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator enumerate how many commodities will be embraced under section 5 (a) of his amendment and what the nature and character of those commodities are?

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, the Tariff Commission furnished me that information. It is, however, a subject which would take up more time than I have at my disposal under the limited arrangement under which I am permitted to discuss my amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that. Will the Senator print the information I have requested in connection with his remarks?

Mr. HEBERT. I may say, for the information of the Senator, that it includes——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I express the hope that this time may be charged to me rather than to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I shall be glad to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks, for the information of the Senator, that which he desires, if that will serve his purpose.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I have before me an article which appeared in the Herald Tribune of yesterday which discusses most intelligently the foreign trade of the United States as it affects the textile industry, and its exportations to the Philippine Islands. I desire to quote from that article only briefly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, may I be permitted to insert certain portions of the article I was about to quote in my remarks?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TYPICAL OF GENERAL CONDITIONS

There is an American end to the matter which indicates that the Philippine case is typical of a general condition affecting the whole of American export trade. American cotton manufacturers are unable to compete with Japanese cotton manufacturers in Central and South America, in South Africa, or in most other countries where American cottons have long been sent in comparatively large volume. They are unable to compete with Japanese goods in the Philippines even behind the high Philippine tariff wall. The cause is high prices in the United States.

These high prices exist in spite of the fact that there has been so great an overproduction by American mills as to necessitate a 25-percent reduction in production allotments, even at a time when some mills are running only 2 or 3 days a week. The explanation of high prices in connection with overproduction is high wages under the code system. The superiority of American workmen over Japanese workmen may be conceded, although this is far less under modern cotton-mill organization in Japan than has been generally ascribed, but it ought to be evident that American mills with a $14.76 wage base for a 30- to 40-hour week cannot compete with Japanese mills with a $9 or $10 wage base for an 84-hour week.

ATTEMPTING THE IMPOSSIBLE

This raises the more general question of how the authorities in Washington can expect to increase the foreign trade of the United States in face of increasing wages and other manufacturing costs. There is the possibility that, in spite of high wages, actual manufacturing costs may be kept low in comparison with those of other countries by improved machinery and other manufacturing facilities, but the fact is that in some lines other countries are employing machinery and manufacturing facilities fully as advanced and quite as efficient and economical as those used in the United States.

Increased exports of American products so far the current year as compared with the same period last year have been entirely in those lines in which the United States has a distinct competitive advantage either by reason of its policy of mass production, its natural resources, or its geographical position. In other commodities there has been stagnation or retrogression.

In lines which are strictly competitive high wages under the code system effect a definite disadvantage for American manufacturers in the export trade which general manufacturing efficiency has little prospect of overcoming. This is already evident in the cotton-goods trade, in spite of American advantages in the way of raw materials. It is becoming more and more evident in other lines such as iron and steel, flour and rubber manufactures. The N.R.A. code system and foreign trade, in short, are pointed in the opposite directions, and in attempting to make them work together the authorities in Washington are attempting the impossible.

RECIPROCAL TREATIES INSUFFICIENT

How far reciprocal trade treaties may be expected to remedy this situation is very questionable. It is reasonable to assume that, as between nations producing upon a comparable-cost basis, reciprocal tariff concessions may afford a worth-while, although very temporary, advantage to the nations concerned in commodities in which either may specialize. It is quite as unreasonable to assume, however, that any such reciprocal trade arrangements can be sufficient to overcome the difference between basic manufacturing conditions of the sort that exists between Japan and the United States under the code system.

TRADE SHOT TO PIECES

In January 1933 Japan's share was only 21 percent of the island's cotton piece-goods trade as compared with 73 percent for the United States. By December 1933 the proportion had changed to 58 percent for Japan and 31 percent for the United States. There was a slight recovery in American shipments in the pre-Easter period of the current year, but the recovery was temporary, and the latest Government reports indicate that Japanese competition has again come to dominate the trade, forcing down prices, eliminating American goods in the lower grades, and piling up stocks to further depress prices.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HASTINGS and Mr. HEBERT asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERTON (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. Making the same announcement as heretofore with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to announce that were the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] present he would vote "nay."

Mr. PATTERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). My general pair the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. I am therefore compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. HEBERT. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HATFIELD (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are detained on official business.

On this question the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 52, as follows:

So Mr. HEBERT's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair announce that under his understanding of the unanimous-consent agreement he feels he should recognize first any Senator having a so-called "agricultural amendment" to offer, and therefore he will ask the leader of the minority whether there are other Senators who have agricultural amendments to offer?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I intimated a while ago that I am not wholly in accord with the present occupant of the chair in his understanding. Later on some Senator, not now present, who has an agricultural amendment to offer ought not to be precluded from offering it because he is not present at this particular moment. That is clearly the intention and that is clearly the language of the unanimous-consent agreement. When the proper time comes I shall be glad to discuss the matter with the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. For what purpose?

Mr. BLACK. In order that I may ask to have something inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must insist on carrying out the unanimous-consent agreement and enforcing the rule. The Senator from California may not yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Chair has held that I may not yield; so, being under a very strict limitation and under a very strict ruling, I shall proceed with the amendment that is mine. Will the clerk read the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, at the end of the bill, to insert the following new section:

SEC. —. No foreign trade agreement entered into under the provisions of this act shall become effective until submitted to the Congress and specifically approved by law.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, for the brief period of 10 minutes let me see whether I can arouse in the United States Senate something it has had in its glorious past and of which it has ever been proud. Let us see if it is not possible, even here, where there is an edict presented to us by various departments of the Government, to have some regard for our own selves, for the position we hold, for the oath we took when we came into this body, and for the powers and prerogatives which have been here reposing in this body ever since there has been a United States Senate at all.

The amendment which I have offered, sir, seeks to preserve to this body the right to pass upon the treaties which shall be made by the President of the United States under the provisions of the bill. An awful thing is that to do! Senators will remember that it was tyranny when a flexible provision of the tariff was suggested in 1929. Then a little flexible provision in the tariff law was tyranny; today, when it is proposed not only to give flexibility to the tariff law but to empower the Executive to do just exactly as he pleases with our taxing power, it is freedom—freedom instead of tyranny.

Here is the opportunity for us to deside whether we are going to act in accordance with the traditions of this body, whether we are going to preserve the authority which has been ours during all these years, whether we are going to be United States Senators, or whether we are simply to register the will of a couple of executive departments of the Government.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I cannot yield. I have not time.

Mr. DILL. I want to ask the meaning of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am endeavoring to state it. I am doing the best I can to make plain that I want to have come back here to the Senate the agreements which may be entered into, to be passed upon then by the Senate of the United States. That is the simple purpose of the amendment. If its language does not accomplish that purpose, I should be glad to accept any amendment that may be suggested with that object in view.

Mr. DILL. The Senator says "by law." That is why I asked the question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I repeat, I do not know a better suggestion that could be made than to use the expression "by law."

Mr. DILL. Does that mean we must have a separate statute enacted?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; but we must have separate action on it just as we have upon any statute or any act or any particular determination by the Congress of the United States, and I shall accept any amendment which will preserve the purpose that may be desired. I cannot yield otherwise because of the limitation under which I rest.

Mr. President, it is asserted that we ought not to give this power to the Congress of the United States because it is claimed that an emergency exists, and there must be immediate action on the part of the Executive in order to accomplish the design of the bill. It is asserted to us again and again and again that that emergency existing, and the necessity for quick action being here, we cannot do anything that may delay matters in the slightest degree, even though we deprive the Senate and the Congress of all the powers they may have had in the past. Not so, sir—not so. The testimony of Mr. Wallace that is before me here tells us that they are going to move slowly; they are going to take great time, and yet they are going to move with wisdom, and not with the celerity and alacrity that will require action overnight. The testimony of Dr. Sayre is of like character; and then he goes into detail as to how these agreements are acted upon in various other nations of the earth.

Of course, reciprocal agreements are provided for by excutive power in other nations; granted, but sir, parliamentary action as well is required in many of those countries. In the one whose government is comparable to, though not like ours at all, Dr. Sayre states, on page 365 of the testimony that was given in the House:

In England, reductions made in the course of agreements may become provisionally effective, subject to the agreement being placed before Parliament, which has 28 legislative days within which to indicate disapproval.

The Parliament of Britain has 28 days in which to indicate its disapproval. The Congress of the United States has not 28 seconds in which to register its will or its disapproval. What I ask for, sir—limit it to 30 days, if you will, in this agreement; limit it as the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] may desire in the expressions that may be used; I do not care—I want the particular amendment to require that these agreements shall come back to the Congress of the United States in order that within 30 days—if Senators wish it, within 28 days—if we are so jealous of the powers of Parliament that we must act as Parliament in Britain does, we must express our disapproval, and if they be granted that 28 days, and we be granted our 28 days, perhaps we can act in accordance with the desires that may be essential on the part, either of the Executive or of those entering into these agreements.

I have listened today to the arguments that have been made about exports. Why, one would think, sir, that we could not export again from this country without having a reciprocal trade agreement—a reciprocal trade agreement that is going to bring the millennium so far as our export trade is concerned. De Senators realize that since 1919 the other nations of the earth have been padding their tariffs just in readiness for this day? That is the report that is here, the official report of the Tariff Commission of the United States, that all the other nations of the earth since 1919 have been erecting their barriers, padding their tariffs, waiting for reciprocal agreements from only one source, of course—the United States of America. Do Senators fondly believe that they, when we enter into a reciprocal agreement with them, will do aught else than give us their padding and take from us sacrifices of our particular products?

Again, we talk of the N.R.A., and we fought for it here. We believe that it brings a new deal. It is bringing higher wages. It is bringing less hours of employment. It is bringing, it is true, higher prices as well, and then we enter into a reciprocal agreement with a foreign country in which they may come into an inefficient industry in this land, practically eliminate and destroy it, and do the exact antithesis of what we were designing to do by the N.R.A.

But the vice of the situation that is presented is far greater than that. What is presented to us today is the abandonment of the fundamental principle upon which this Government rests. What is asked of us today is the supine surrender of what the Senate ever has done and ever ought to do, if it remains a Senate, with its decent regard for its oaths, and its regard, indeed, for its time-honored practices, its traditions of the past, and the service it may render to the country in the future. We are asked to surrender that by this bill. Ought we to do it?

I do not argue the constitutionality of the question. That is far beyond me at the moment. I argue the policy of the question, and when I ask Senators to send back these reciprocal agreements to the Congress for a determination by them as to what they shall do, I am asking, not alone that the Constitution be obeyed, but that popular government shall be preserved in this land, and preserved as it has ever existed here.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I asked the Senator from California the question I did because I think his amendment is susceptible of a number of constructions. I do not quite understand the words "approved by law." Evidently, the Senator's intention is to require that the reciprocal trade agreements shall be voted on by the Congress. It might be construed that they must have a two-thirds vote. It might be construed that we must pass a statute specifically approving them.

I had hoped that the language of an amendment of this kind would provide that the trade agreements should be submitted back to the House and Senate, and should not go into effect until they were approved by a majority of both Houses, that vote to be taken within a limited time, say 5 or 10 days.

The objection is continually made to the proposal that if these trade agreements shall come back to the Senate and the House for a vote, it will be such a long time before the matter is disposed of that we shall never get any action. I think there is much merit in that objection. I think the bill should contain a specific provision that these trade agreements shall come back to the House and Senate in a message from the President and be voted on within a specified time, not to exceed 5 or 10 days, and, if approved by a majority of both Houses, shall be effective.

I have not discussed this bill since it has been before the Senate. I do not approve of this proposed legislation. I shall vote against this bill unless some such provision as this is inserted in it. I am opposed to granting the power to control the tariffs of the United States on products competing with the products of the people of the United States, without any voice on the part of Congress.

I do believe that it may be possible for the President of the United States to make reciprocal trade agreements that would be to the advantage of the people of this country and of foreign countries. I am not willing, however, that he alone shall be the judge of that advantage. I should like to give him the power to enter into these agreements, and, once he has entered into them, to submit them to the House and the Senate to be voted on within a limited specified time, and by that vote to determine whether or not they shall go into effect.

Such a provision would make this proposal really constructive and helpful in the readjustment of our tariff situation. I cannot vote for this amendment in its present form, although I think I approve of the purpose of the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will not the Senator, during the period he may have when this matter is being discussed, frame an amendment such as he would favor?

Mr. DILL. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I admire the enthusiasm and the persistency and the fine personality and the ability of the distinguished senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. When he starts to talk about agreements and about protection for some commodity he is strikingly enthusiastic.

If this amendment should be adopted, it would mean the defeat of the whole proposal. It would destroy the whole plan. It would mean that these agreements must be submitted to the Congress here to be traded in and between, and so forth. No one would ever know when the agreements would be adopted. The amendment would shackle the representatives of this Government in their negotiations to obtain some concession that might empower us to sell some of our surplus goods abroad.

Mr. President, one of the objects of this whole measure is to furnish to the President an instrumentality by which he may combat the governments which are sitting day and night in an effort to obtain reciprocal trade agreements for their benefit and against our trade and against our commerce.

Since the 1st day of January 69 reciprocal trade agreements have been entered into between the foreign countries of the world. If we put into this bill a provision that every agreement must come back to Congress, we shall not get any results. We all expect Congress to adjourn in anywhere from a week to 3 or 4 weeks. Then we shall be away until January, and these agreements will have to wait. How can the representatives of the Government guarantee that the Congress will approve whatever they do?

Mr. President, this bill gives to the President for 3 years the power to build up our trade and our commerce. It is an extraordinary power, but it is one of the steps on the road to recovery. We cannot get anywhere, however, if we shackle the President and require that these agreements shall come back here for approval.

This is not the first time we have done what is proposed in this bill. As has previously been pointed out in the debate, in the Dingley bill, under the leadership of the Republican Party, there was written into law such provision. In the McKinley bill, under the leadership of the Republican Party, the President was given power to negotiate trade agreements without coming back to Congress with them for approval.

The record shows that under the provision which gave to the President the power to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements, without the necessity of bringing them back to Congress, he did negotiate many of them to the advantage of this country, and in other instances where the trade agreements or the treaties had to come back to the Congress, not one was ratified by the Congress.

I submit, Mr. President, that if we are to pass this legislation, we should not pass it with this amendment included in it, because the amendment would destroy its effect. It would mean no legislation at all if the agreements had to be brought back to the Congress, and only those Members of the Senate who are opposed to the proposed legislation are voting for this particular amendment, because they know what its effect would be.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi sums his entire appeal against this amendment in his prayer that there shall be no shackles upon the use of this extraordinary, tyrannical, dictatorial power over the life and death of American economy. He unfortunately concentrates upon the word "shackles." He pleads that Executive authority be unshackled, and that the Congress instead shall assume and wear these bonds.

Mr. President, it strikes me that legislative government, under this new dispensation, is gradually ridding the Executive of so many shackles, if that be the correct descriptive word, that there is precious little ordered democracy left. Is there no point at which this sinister trend shall cease?

At the other end of the Capitol the rulers have gotten rid of all their shackles within the last few days and have put deliberative government in chains. Here in this body our managers have gotten rid of most of their shackles, under this unanimous-consent agreement, to such an extent, indeed, that the distinguished Senator from California was unable even to speak to his own amendment this morning, under the throttling process through which we now operate. There are still shackles, but they are chiefly worn by Congress—and the people.

Shackled! When we tried to ask for public hearings ere a sentence of death should be passed on American industry or agriculture under the terms of the pending tariff bargaining bill we were told that we must not shackle these tariff manipulators, who, behind closed doors, are proposing to deal as they please with industry and agriculture under the flag, deciding for themselves what commodities are entitled to survive and what shall be marked for slaughter. Nothing said about the rights of American labor and American agriculture and American commerce. Shackles for them. But, oh, we must not shackle our overlords!

When we asked to see the so-called "Colombian bargaining treaty"—which is supposed to be a model for the type of tariff agreement which we are here authorizing—we were told that the fact may not be disclosed. Shackles for the Senate—and the treaty power which the fathers and the founders gave it 140 years ago! No shackles for the State Department and the extra-legal executive policy committee which is now to exercise our tax and treaty powers.

When, in perfecting this tariff bargaining bill, we asked provision for notice to the American commodities affected, we were told that this would shackle the operation of this bargaining process in which our bright young men are to undertake to try their untried wits with foreigners who have been experts in this bargaining business for the last 15 years.

Every time any proposal is submitted which undertakes to bring even a modicum of textual protection back to the men and women and the workmen and the farmers of this Nation who have their all at stake in respect to the operation of this tariff process we are told that there must be no shackles. Strange language in a republic. Amazing apostrophe in a democracy. And this was once a government of laws rather than of men.

Mr. President, I think it is about time that there were a few shackles restored to our administrators in the name of elementary constitutionalism. It is time to stand fast for some essential fundamentals of American tradition and of the American system. Restraints, under that system, are intended for the masters. Zeals, under that system, primarily defend the common freedom of the throng.

We need a few shackles upon the exercise of tariff powers by one man who has the entire destiny of America in his hands when he exercises that power. As has been well said, such power should not be wanted by a good man, and should not be allowed to any other. This, in theory at least, is still the Republic.

What is democracy, if it does not involve a few "shackles", to use the tell-tale word of the Senator from Mississippi—shackles upon the exercise of dynastic, dictatorial power that can wreck those who may be the victims of its exercise?

How long has it been since we have had to rid high authority of all shackles under the American flag in order to persist and progress? Thus does Mussolini and fascism. Thus does Hitler in Germany. But this, I repeat, is the United States.

I rise in complete accord with the amendment submitted by the Senator from California. You have denied us a chance to be heard in public with respect to these contemplated tariff changes. You have denied us a chance to have the affected commodities dependably notified ere a death sentence shall be passed upon them. You have denied us a chance to exempt agriculture, although you tell us that nothing is going to happen to agriculture. You deny us a chance to put a single, solitary protecting word in this legislation, and then, because a final exercise of the fundamental, traditional, constitutional power of the Senate of the United States is submitted by the Senator from California, you tell us we must not put shackles upon this economic dictatorship.

Mr. President, it is in the name of just one last, lingering shackle in behalf of democracy that I support the amendment submitted by the Senator from California.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think I may not be counted as one of those opposed to the pending legislation. Quite to the contrary, I believe in the bill and I shall support it.

This measure is probably the last barrier between this country and a thorough-going policy of economic isolation. It may be that such a policy is inevitable and wise, but the history of the world has been the history of the development of international trade. Before we turn aside from this history and embark upon a new course we should make at least one effort to revive our foreign trade. Only by clothing the President with the power prescribed in this measure can that be accomplished.

That the President will use the power wisely, for the benefit of all our people, I am sure no one will deny. Efforts to arouse fears will fail. Efforts to divert attention from the terms and purposes of the bill and to embarrass its supporters will likewise fail. All the energies of the President have been directed to improving the condition of our people and particularly to improving the condition of those engaged in agriculture. Their faith in him will not be disturbed.

I cannot, however, avoid the conclusion that the argument presented by the Senator from California is well founded. As a representative from one of the sovereign States of this Union, I cannot help feeling that the people of that State have the right to have any agreement which may be reached under the provisions of this bill presented to the Congress before it shall become effective.

In harmony with the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from California that he is willing to accept perfecting amendments, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, it is proposed at the end of the bill to insert the following:

Every proclamation of the President under this act shall be submitted to the Congress while in session, and shall not become effective until the expiration of 30 calendar days after such submission, unless Congress shall by a majority vote of both Houses provide for an earlier effective date of such proclamation: Provided, That if Congress shall adjourn before the expiration of 30 calendar days from the date of such submission, such proclamation shall not become effective until after the expiration of 30 calendar days from the opening day of the next succeeding regular or special session.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I may say that the language of the proposed substitute is practically identical with the language in the Treasury and Post Office Appropriation Act approved March 3, 1933, by which the President was given the authority to merge executive branches of the Government. The President has the right by Executive order to combine bureaus, but such Executive order may not become effective until it shall be presented to Congress.

I can see that under the provisions of the amendment as presented by the Senator from California it would be altogether possible for the Congress, by means of parliamentary procedure, to delay and to kill any reciprocal-tariff agreement, but under the provisions of the substitute which I have offered it would be possible to obtain expeditious action, and any effort, by filibuster or otherwise, to kill a reciprocal agreement would be ineffective, because the agreement would become the law of the land at the expiration of 30 days.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Suppose the amendment offered by the Senator should be adopted and Congress should adjourn on Saturday next, and that an agreement should be negotiated; would there be any way of putting it into effect before Congress met at the next session?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Not until Congress came into regular or special session.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, no matter how beneficial the proposed agreement might be to us, no matter how many other countries should enter into agreements against us, the United States would be deprived of any opportunity to benefit; we would have to wait until the next session of the Congress, in January, and then 30 days after that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I may say that that is a defect which is inherent in democracy.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming whether or not this amendment means anything except that the President would have to make a report to Congress. It does not say that any agreement would have to be approved by Congress; it does not say it would have to be disapproved. What would be the effect of the amendment?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Clearly the effect of the amendment would be, I think, that Congress would have an opportunity to disapprove any agreement, if it so desired, just as it may disapprove any Executive order relating to the merger of branches of the Government. That is the general interpretation of the provision upon which it is modeled.

Mr. DICKINSON. The amendment provides that it "shall not become effective until the expiration of 30 calendar days after such submission unless Congress shall by majority vote of both Houses provide for an earlier effective date of such proclamation."

I do not believe it is implied by that language that the Congress would have the right to refuse, or would have the veto power. As a matter of fact, I do not believe the amendment means anything except that we would have a report from the President on the proposed agreements for 30 days before they became effective. That is all it means.

We ought to do what the Democratic Party did during the consideration of the 1930 tariff bill, namely, insist that any agreement must be submitted to Congress for approval. I remember the Fletcher amendment, which was offered as a substitute for the Smoot amendment. In that amendment the very declaration was that Congress should retain its legislative right to control tariff schedules, and that no agreement should be made which should not have the approval of the legislative body.

I think we ought to consider where is this leading. Representative TREADWAY made this statement on June 9, 1933:

> Another proof of the fact that the present tariff law has had little or nothing to do with the decline in foreign trade lies in the fact that the value of imported merchandise which is free of duty continues to be two-thirds of the total value of all imported merchandise. If the tariff act were operating to prevent the importation of foreign products, the decline in dutiable articles would naturally be greater than the decline in free merchandise. Instead the ratio between dutiable and free goods remains practically constant.

I think there is the best proof that we shall not be able to get any agreement which will be beneficial by virtue of the adjustment of the tariff act as suggested in the pending bill.

Then we come to the decision: Do we want to give the President the right to negotiate all trade agreements without any review on the part of the representatives of the people in Congress? Are we going to continue representative constitutional government or are we going to delegate all our authority to the Chief Executive?

It is said: "Oh, we are going to do this for 3 years." Those who say that it is for 3 years will find they will have trouble in ever retracing the step they are about to take. If there was a mistake made, as was suggested by the Senator from Maryland the other day, it was probably due to the fact that we went further than we should have gone with respect to the adjustable provision of the tariff act. However, we have taken that step. As I said then, I say now, if it is a question of whether or not we shall advance to the point where we shall give the President supreme power or go back to the point where we give him no power at all, I desire to go back where we retain all the power instead of transferring more of it to the Chief Executive.

The theory that we shall sacrifice our economic interests in making trade agreements is wrong. Let me suggest why. Even though most of the countries of the world have their tariff authority centered in the head of the government, it will be found that we are maintaining our international trade today on the same parity and about as well as any other country in the world. Therefore, in what we are doing now we are running the risk of ridding ourselves of all this authority, and, in my judgment, we are also running the risk of the Chief Executive's becoming inveigled into some trade agreements which will not be to the benefit of the public in general. In other words, we are taking a step here which, in my judgment, is the longest step we have ever taken in the destruction of that representative constitutional government in which we have taken such great pride for all these years.

Another thing which has been mentioned is what other countries have done. In Mr. TREADWAY's speech on June 9, 1933, he quoted from the Tariff Commission, as follows:

> At this moment, when so many countries are maintaining emergency tariff rates and trade barriers, care must be taken to avoid the possibility that the United States would obtain in return for its tariff concessions only the abandonment of measures too cumbersome and oppressive, and of tariff rates too high, to outlast the depression. For example, the tariff rates imposed by certain European countries on wheat as measures of price stabilization and to save their producers from the effects of the abnormally low price of the commodity will inevitably be reduced if and when there is a substantial increase in the world price for cereals; and reciprocal tariff agreements by which concessions were made in return for the reduction of such temporary duties might mean the grant of valuable concessions in return for totally illusory concessions.

In other words, most of the nations of Europe today are in a position to negotiate tariff agreements, having padded their rates before they begin their negotiations. My judgment is that the Johnson amendment, which would exempt the agricultural schedules from the provisions of this bill, is an all-important factor. Why? Because the great majority of the countries with which we are going to trade are producing a surplus of food products, or raw materials, and they are the ones that are going to seek agreements whereby they will come in and attempt to absorb our markets. Yet here we are, men representing agricultural States, voting to hold the agricultural schedules within the control of the provisions of this proposed law, when, as a matter of fact, I should say the chances are 9 to 1 that there will be no possibility of a trade agreement for the benefit of agriculture, and every possibility and probability—a 10-to-1 chance—that agriculture will lose by any trade agreement which can possibly be worked out.

It is my judgment that if the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming should be adopted, the whole bill should be defeated; but, on the other hand, if it is to become a law, certainly we ought to see that there should be provided some review of proposed action by Congress on these various schedules.

I notice now that although the strongest advocate of free trade and of tariff for revenue only, and of a competitive tariff—the Democratic Party has been in control in the House for over 3 years, and in control of the Senate for more than a year, yet to the present time there has been absolutely no suggestion that we should revise any tariff schedule downward. The only contention made before the Senate, and also made before the Ways and Means Committee of the House was that the purpose of the Democratic legislation was to make tariff rates lower. It was so confessed by the Senator from Tennessee and so testified by one of the members of the Ways and Means Committee from the State of Missouri in the House hearings. Therefore, if we desire lower rates, and if the commitment of the Democratic Party is for lower rates, let us have a revision of the tariff and have lower rates. But let this not be a "pig in the poke" transaction whereby the State Department and its great executive-policy committee, and the Executive shall have the right to do what they please, regardless of what interests are affected, and not have anyone know anything about their dealings until after those dealings are entirely concluded. To me it is the most offensive thing that we have had confronting us since I have been a Member of either House of the Congress of the United States.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am convinced that we ought to take affirmative action on one or the other of the amendments which have been submitted. I prefer the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. I do not think the substitute means anything because it requires affirmative action within a certain time else an agreement which has been negotiated becomes effective. Anyone can see that if a particular group in the Congress desire to make a trade agreement effective they could very easily prevent a vote coming within a certain day. For that reason I think the substitute has an element of weakness.

Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has again reiterated the suggestion, which has been made here often, that this proposed legislation is not new; that similar legislation was contained in the Dingley bill and also in the McKinley bill. Of course the Senator was not really in earnest when he made that statement because such authority as is here written was not in either one of those laws. All that was suggested in those laws was that certain power be given to the President under provisions which were written by the Congress limiting the President in his operations, and, of course, where power is delegated with limitations imposed by the delegating authority, and the administrative officer is held within the limits of that authority, that does not approach what we are proposing to do here. Yet the provisions in the acts referred to, containing those limitations, seem to be considered as affording a precedent, although they cannot possibly stand as a precedent for this unprecedented proposal.

Some of us 3 years ago when the flexible-tariff provision was under consideration suggested that there might be some question as to the extent of the authority granted, even going as far as it did, and some of us, including many on this side of the Chamber, voted for the provision with some reluctance because of a disinclination to give too much authority to the President in legislation on the tariff question. However, we laid down the limitation upon which the President could act under the flexible provisions of that law.

The first limitation was that such action had to be taken upon the basis of a finding that was made by a nonpartisan body created for that purpose; and, secondly, the nonpartisan body's finding had to be within the limits of the law written by the Congress when it gave the authority. Far from that situation, as to which even then there was some question as to whether or not the power should be given, we have here a proposition to confer unlimited authority, which requires no guidance from the Congress, which in no way designates the course which the President must pursue in his findings, and which makes no provision that the difference between the cost of production in the two countries is to be considered. All that is eliminated in this proposed legislation. It is desired to give the President the absolute authority not only to deal with individual tariff items but to determine what the tariff policy of the Nation shall be, although it has always been conceded, and never before has a proposition to the contrary been introduced here, that the policy-determining function lies in the legislative department of the Government and the Executive is limited to administering that policy as fixed by the legislative department. Here, however, we are proposing to pass the power of policy determination to the Executive, who is the administering officer, and to make him the policy-determining authority and also the administering officer. No such effort, so far as I know, in the history of our land has ever before been made.

When we ask why we should be requested to do such an unheard-of thing, the answer is given, "This must be done speedily; if we put the power in the Congress it will delay the proceeding." When we ask, as in the case of the administration of the present flexible provision of the tariff law, that there be hearings and that such hearings shall be open and public, in order that people who are interested may be heard, we are answered, "No. If there be public hearings we shall defeat our purpose; such hearings must be secret."

Mr. President, it is an old saying that men choose darkness rather than light because their ways may be such as that the light would interfere with them. What is it we want to have the President do that cannot be done in the open?

What is there in this undertaking that it has to be executed in the darkness? Why should the public be shut out from it? Why should there be no hearings in cases where the public is interested? The answer is, Mr. President, that such a course will delay action. The unbroken precedents of history show that wherever speed has been resorted to, it would have been better to have left undone that which was done and which would not have been done if time had been taken to consider the question. There can be no good purpose interfered with by taking time, for if taking time will defeat what ought to be defeated, taking time is justified; and if taking time will defeat what should not have been defeated that condition may be remedied in time; but if we do not take time, and thus do that which ought to be defeated and would have been defeated had time been taken, then it is too late. But the claim on the part of the advocates of the measures of the administration is that they must not be interfered with; that the Executive must not be hindered; that he must have authority to act quickly and in the dark and not take the people into consideration. This, to me, is the most undemocratic measure that we have ever had proposed to this body or to any other body. There is no good that can be frustrated by taking time, and any purpose which ought to be frustrated will usually be frustrated by taking time.

I want to say to my friends that the contention that the speed which is now sought is necessary and that what is proposed to be done must be done within the 30 days or America is gone is silly. America has lived for more than 150 years and will continue to live. The passage of this bill must not be considered as the only condition by which the Nation is going to survive; we will survive if we shall not pass it; and I say that we shall survive and have a more substantial recovery under normal processes and constitutional processes, not with such speed, perhaps, but with the assurance of making no mistake by our taking the necessary time.

So speed is no argument and secrecy is no argument. I think that before the President is given plenary power to do as he likes in establishing a policy involving the many billion dollars of wealth in our country, we ought to provide that whatever action he may take under the bill shall be brought back to Congress to say by a majority vote, "This is all right." If we do not do that, if we impose no limitation whatsoever, we might just as well abdicate, give over the power of Congress to the President, and go home.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not want to take more than 3 or 4 minutes to remind the Senator from Ohio that for 12 years we had Presidents who followed his advice and the advice of those who agree with him. The Senator from Ohio was one of those who was close up to the throne. At the time the Government was taken over by the Republican Party it was in a remarkably fine condition; it was one of the finest governmental machines the world had ever seen. It was well oiled, well painted; every piece was in repair. It had not a single knock anywhere; it was running smoothly. Now, by following the theory of government which the Senator from Ohio has announced of late so frequently, at the end of 12 years the whole governmental machinery had fallen into complete ruin; the Government had been destroyed; and now the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Iowa, and some of the other great Senators who have seen that happen are insisting that we go back and allow them to give us the same kind of medicine that the country lived on for 12 years, which destroyed the country. It may be that some of us are wrong in trying these new things, as they are designated by our Republican friends, but we naturally just have to take something, as we know that the remedies suggested by the Senator from Ohio will not bring this country back to happiness and complete recovery. The fact is that the theories advocated by these distinguished Republicans are the very theories that brought it to destruction.

Our good Republican friends talk about this measure destroying the business of the country. I should like to ask them sincerely, and I wish they would give me just a plain, honest answer, if they can answer it at all, who, in all the United States, is most interested in the recovery of this Nation? Who is most interested in bringing peace and happiness and prosperity to the people of the United States of America?

The answer is obvious: The President of the United States. Everything is at stake so far as he is concerned. He will be judged in history by what he does toward restoring happiness to the people. To say that it is his purpose or the purpose of his friends to do that which would deliberately bring destruction upon the country is a foolish thing to say.

The people have confidence in the President of the United States, and well they may. His heart is with the great masses of the American people. He loves humanity. He lives according to the law prescribed by the old prophet when he announced that the whole duty of man is to do justice, to love mercy, and to walk humbly before his God. Because the President does that, because he loves the people of America and desires to bring happiness to them, those who are afraid that he might be reelected or that someone who agrees with him and his policies might be elected have started the miners, the sappers, the snipers, in an effort to destroy the confidence of the American people in the President of the United States. I believe they will not succeed because the people have a way of finding out the truth, and they know that Franklin D. Roosevelt, the President of the United States, is their only hope in these dark days. There is no one else who carries the torch which lights the way, and I believe those efforts to destroy the confidence and the love which the American people have for him will not be successful—and they ought not to succeed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not to be considered as antagonistic to the objects and purposes of this legislation. I believe one of the problems directly connected with the question of recovery and of permanent prosperity of the country is the building up of foreign trade. Insofar as it can be done with due regard to domestic interests, I find myself in entire accord with the objective which has been so well presented here by the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

In the few minutes I have at my command I do not propose to undertake to weigh the derelictions between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party with reference to granting powers which ought never to be granted to anyone. I do think this measure goes further than we have ever gone before, but I am quite sure it is the logical result of what we have done before. When we began to digress from the well-established rules and principles which had been observed in this country for more than a hundred years and to delegate power which we knew perfectly well at the time we delegated it was a power which belonged to the Congress alone, we set a precedent which would inevitably lead to what we have here in the Senate today, and that is a further extension of the power. When we initiated these unconstitutional delegations of power we left the port and put out to the open sea. We now have neither rudder nor compass. Our only guide is political expediency and each of the old parties justifies its acts by citing a precedent established by the other.

I took occasion to say when the flexible-tariff provision was before the Senate on September 26, 1929:

> If we transfer to the Executive the power we here propose to transfer, when and where shall we halt in our mad and reckless generosity? If we set the pace, what Congress may we hope will have the integrity of purpose, the courage, the patriotism, to stay the craven surrender of power now going on and to put an end to this chronic renunciation of the obligations given to and imposed upon us by the Constitution?

The Democrats are citing the precedents of the past as a justification for the present bill. The next Congress, though it may be Republican, will cite this precedent for another ruthless invasion of constitutional government, and the mad and reckless surrender of our duties goes on apace. I expect to see, if I should live to the time allotted to Moses, in this Chamber a proposal to give the President of the United States the power to determine, under certain vague rules, the amount of income taxes that should be collected.

There is only one thing to do and that is to get back to the Constitution, and live by it and under it until the people change it. These parties which are in power from time to time, which mistake party feeling for constitutional principles, are establishing precedents in this country which they, with us and all others, will see the day they will rue. What both the old parties need is a baptism of constitutional principles.

Mr. President, as I said, I am in favor of building up our foreign trade, but I have a feeling that I want to be present and have a part in the program of building up our foreign trade. It is a delicate program because it must necessarily affect wide interests throughout the country. I feel, as a Senator having certain obligations which I have voluntarily assumed, that I ought not to surrender those obligations; I ought not to put myself in a position where I cannot, if I think it is proper, disagree and effectively disagree with a program of building up foreign trade.

It may be that I would be entirely satisfied with any agreement the President would make. I am perfectly willing to agree with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] and to agree in all sincerity with the Senator from Kentucky that the President's motives are of the highest and that he has at heart the interests of the people of the United States. This is not a matter of respect or confidence, it may be a matter of honest difference of opinion, and I know of no reason why I should surrender all power to express by vote an opinion of what I think is to the best interest of the people of my State and the country at large. There is a wide divergence of opinion when we come to dealing with a question of this kind as to how we may effectively serve the people of the United States. Why should I put myself in a position where I would be powerless to protect my constituents? I have been selected by them and they knew the obligations which devolved upon me when they selected me. If I surrender those obligations, abandon the duties which are imposed upon me, how am I to protect the interests of my constituency in case their interests should be involved? What right, legal or moral, have I to put myself in a position where I cannot serve them?

We are informed there is a treaty now lying somewhere about the State Department dealing with Argentina and Brazil. Argentina has very little to send into this country except that of which our people produce a surplus.

Let us suppose this treaty did provide for a larger importation of beef into this country, either on the hoof or slaughtered, and my people should feel greatly injured, as they would be, by such a treaty. Where would I be, a Senator of the United States, to whom the taxing power in part has been delegated by the Constitution? Where am I when my constituency call upon me to act? I am powerless. I have surrendered my power. I have delegated it to another. I am voiceless and I am voteless to protect the people of my State. I have no language to express my abhorrence of such a proposal.

It is not a question, sir, of the good intentions or high motives of the President of the United States, but I claim for myself individually some knowledge of the affairs of my State which it is impossible for the President of the United States to possess. If my constituency telegraph me or write me or ask me to present their cause and to present the facts as they see them, I should not have surrendered my power to do so. It is that against which I am inveighing.

I say that these treaties are now in the State Department. We all highly respect the Secretary of State, a cultured, high-class, patriotic citizen. But his views and my views upon many of these questions, his views and the views of my constituency upon many of these questions, are wide apart. Let us suppose that in writing the treaty with Argentina he has seen fit to incorporate in principle what he said here upon the floor of the Senate some years ago. He said:

> I agree now to pay $500 to any charity, if any impartial group of unbiased economists to be selected should not find that the tariff injuries as a whole to the producers of these 8 staple products are not 3 to 5 times greater than the tariff benefits.

I have no doubt that he would execute these treaties in accordance with his convictions. He is a man of convictions. When he does so he may leave the cattle grower, the wool grower, the pea grower, the bean grower of my State utterly unprotected. He may not, but he may. If he does, where is the Senator from Idaho? Powerless. He has surrendered all power to protect the people who selected him for the position which he now holds.

Mr. President, I noticed a few days ago, in one of the addresses in the West, that Mr. Wallace—another gentleman who undoubtedly will have much to do with this matter—said that there were many industries, some of them agricultural, which were living practically upon a bounty from the people of the United States, inefficient industries. That may be true; but, as a Senator, I want to be present when it is determined whether or not it is true. I do not want to have surrendered all the power I have to say to Mr. Wallace, "I disagree with you. My people disagree with you. We think you are mistaken"; and I ought to be in a position where I can do what I do effectively.

That, Mr. President, is what we are called upon to do—not to disparage the integrity of purpose of the President of the United States but to retain unto ourselves the responsibility and the power given to us under the Constitution, which our constituents expect us to exercise, and no more.

Sometime ago we had before us legislation with reference to sugar, a matter of very great concern to the people of my State. There is not a Senator here who knows the facts about that matter who does not know that had the administrative authorities had their way the sugar industry in the West would have been doomed. It was so declared in plain language. It was thought to be an inefficient industry; but by reason of the fact that there were a Senate and a House where the voices of the respective Members counted, the program was so changed as at least to give the sugar producers a chance for existence. Men representing the Government appeared before the committees of Congress and coolly, rather indifferently, and with that solemn assurance so characteristic of a man learned in theory but illiterate in wisdom, declared that the sugar industry must be permitted to die; that it was not efficient and could not exist without doing violence to the integrity of that economic world which never existed, and never will exist, except in the fertile fancy of some restless dreamer. No thought was given to the thousands of farmers who had spent a lifetime almost in making the industry a success, and whose very success gave the lie to theory. No thought was given of what was to become of these bankrupt farmers after the theorists got through with them. Had the power been given or had the power existed, this industry would have been destroyed by these theorists.

We are told that all this takes time and that we must act with great speed. It is said that we cannot wait on the cumbersome, slowly moving machinery set up by the framers of the Government, but that we must adopt a wholly new plan in order that we may act secretly, speedily; that we may go forward with serene, cheerful promptitude. In the interest of speed, of haste, the lawmaking and treaty-making powers of the Government are to be set aside. But when you are imposing taxes, when you are framing a customs policy which may seriously affect the physical and economic well-being of millions, it is not so much speed that we need as accuracy, not so much haste as justice, not secrecy but open, candid hearings and interchange of views. These things are essential that substantial justice may be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The time of the Senator from Idaho has expired.

NEED OF PROTECTION FOR THE FARMERS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if I may be permitted just to follow up what the Senator from Idaho has said about sugar, I will do so briefly. I had not intended to take the floor had not his time expired.

It was declared by the Department of Agriculture, as I read the testimony before a House committee, that they regarded the sugar industry as one of those existing on a bounty. I desire to say to my friends on this side of the Chamber that they are living in a false sense of security if they think the bill recently passed protects sugar. It does not. There is ample authority in the bills which have been passed for the tariff on sugar to be changed by treaty or by classification. Further, this is the last enactment of Congress, and previous enactments of Congress must yield to what is contained in this measure.

Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture, brilliant as he may be, could not have been elected to represent the sugar growers of my State nor the sugar growers of the West. His views on agriculture are not shared by the American people who are affected by this proposed legislation. The sugar industry has been given a great deal of attention only in a disparaging way by the supposed to be free-trade advocates. Sugar in this country at one time sold for 30 cents a pound. It now sells for 5 cents a pound. Protected sugar sells for a nickel a pound. Unprotected sugar sold for 30 cents a pound in the United States.

When the sugar tariff had been taken off and sugar production in this country had been left to the mercies of foreign competition, America, with a destroyed domestic sugar industry, saw sugar go from 5 cents a pound to 30 cents a pound. With the tariff that now prevails on sugar in America, sugar sells in the United States cheaper than it does anywhere else in the world. Sugar sells here in America today cheaper than it sells in any other place in the world today; why? Because America has kept a domestic sugar industry alive in the United States, and it has grown by leaps and bounds, with the beet-sugar industry of the West, to a point where, if this protection should remain, America soon would be on a self-sustaining basis; and America needs to expand its sugar crop. It is one of the commodities for which there is a domestic need; and if America has a trade agreement entered into with regard to sugar—which is altogether possible, and I might say probable, under this bill—it means, not that the people will buy sugar for 5 cents a pound but that it will go on toward the 30-cent mark that they paid before when sugar had no protection.

My State is a sugar State. It is a lumber State. It is an oil State. It is a cotton State. It is a pepper State. While for a number of years in that State we were divided on the tariff question, we have come to know that we must have a tariff on everything we have there.

Now we are told that we must entrust this bill into the hands of bureaus which are to decide in secrecy, which are to make their trade agreements without consultation with us, which are to levy whatever kind of life or death they want to levy against our industry, and not one word about it can be heard from us. Let no man sitting here be secure or sanguine but that he is voting into the hands of the Department of Agriculture the power to destroy the wool industry, the power to destroy the sugar industry, and the power to destroy many other industries of this country that are living by tariff protection.

Pepper has to be protected from the pepper of Mexico and of other tropical countries. Fruit has to be protected by a tariff in order to live. Walnuts, almonds, and all such products as California raises have to be protected by a tariff in order to live. If America today votes to enact this bill, which it is going to do, and places in the hands of the bureaus of this country the power to destroy these tariffs or to weaken them, let no man be misled as to what he is voting for, because we are voting authority here today to destroy the tariffs on sugar and on wool and on other agricultural commodities.

Somebody wonders why the wool market is going down. There is no reason why anybody should be puzzled about that.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky, though I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. LOGAN. If a tariff on sugar makes sugar sell cheaper in the United States than anywhere else in the world, why would not a tariff on wool make wool sell cheaper?

As I understand the argument of the Senator, it is contradictory. He says if we put a tariff on sugar, sugar sells cheaper; but if we put a tariff on other things it makes the other things sell higher. Does not the Senator know that a tariff has but one purpose, and that is to make the product which is manufactured in our country, and sold in competition with the product of foreign countries, sell higher than it would without a tariff?

Mr. LONG. I am very glad to answer the Senator. His question shows the goodness of heart of the Senator, and his lack of understanding. [Laughter.]

Sugar, outside of America, is dominated by monopolies. Wool is not. In the foreign field, the sugar industry is controlled by a monopoly, a trust; and when they have control of the sugar market, when the competition of the industry, which is independent in America, is wiped out, sugar goes sky-high. There is not the same monopoly in the control of the foreign-wool industry as there is in the control of the foreign-sugar industry.

Having answered that question to my friend from Kentucky, and realizing that my answer will not convince him or change his vote a bit on earth, I pass on, as I have only a moment's time.

There is, however, a reason why protection should exist. In the long run, may I say, if we were to leave the domestic-wool industry at the mercy of foreign competition, a monopoly in wool might develop to a point where wool domestically would be higher than it is with a tariff to protect it. In the long run it probably would reach the same situation that sugar did. Sugar reached exactly that position. Here were our friends over there with their tongues hanging out, saying that they were going to give the baby cheaper sugar. They had a sign on every barrel of sugar that went to a grocery store, "Wire your Representative and your Senator to vote to take the tariff off sugar. If you do, sugar is going to be 2 cents cheaper." We went ahead and did it, and instead of going from 5 cents down to 3 cents it went from 5 cents up to 30 cents.

That does not mean anything to a free-trader. He cannot see it. He is just as blind as a mole. He cannot understand it, and never will understand it; but that is exactly what happens whenever we subject the domestic competitive market to a monopoly.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield, though I have only just a moment.

Mr. BLACK. Neither can he believe it.

Mr. LONG. My friend from Alabama is hard to understand, and I refuse to hire an interpreter.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator stated that the gentlemen who were opposed to that could not understand that theory, and I said, neither could they believe it.

Mr. LONG. I must be dense, for I did not understand the Senator. I can understand how the Senator cannot believe it. No, Mr. President, they cannot believe it. They cannot see it. Right over there in Alabama, the State near to me, they get their sugar quite often from us. One time they had a tariff, and they got it for a nickel a pound. The next time they did not have a tariff, and they paid 30 cents a pound; but they cannot understand the difference. That two bits a pound difference did not mean a thing in the world to them. They still believed there was just something out of place about it; and yet, with 500,000 families in this country dependent upon the sugar industry of this country today, and millions of people dependent upon the wool industry today, millions of people dependent upon the farm and agricultural tariffs that prevail as well as the industrial tariffs, the sword of Damocles is to be put over their heads every minute and every hour of the day. One ipse dixit, one sweep of this dictatorial power, one bureaucratic order, and the industry fades as the morning comes.

That is what we are voting for today. Let us understand it. Some man may come back here next winter with his industry destroyed. We are doing it here today. This is the bill and this is the vote which can accomplish the defeat and the destruction of these domestic enterprises.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, some time ago I offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 4, but I shall not call it up, because the subject matter of that amendment has been very largely covered in most respects, and certain provisions have actually been voted upon, and I do not want to cover the same ground twice.

As a matter of fact, I would much prefer to have section 4 entirely eliminated. I think it attempts to offer a security which is not in fact any protection. I think the impression it seems to convey is false in many respects, and I believe the bill would be a much more honest bill, and would reflect more accurately what the proponents really mean, if that particular section were entirely eliminated.

However, there is one feature which I did have in my amendment which has not as yet been touched upon, and which I think has merit and must be of interest to the Senate. With that in mind, I send to the desk an amendment, and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6, line 10, after the word "designate", it is proposed to insert the following words:

At a public hearing, said hearing to be public unless the President shall determine and declare a public hearing is not in the public interest and.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, is the Senator offering that as an amendment to the so-called "Johnson amendment"?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; I am just having the amendment read at this time. I will call it up for a vote later.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from New Jersey understands that an amendment is now pending?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey understands that there is pending an amendment offered by the Senator from California. The Senator from New Jersey is offering his amendment to be read only, and he desires to comment upon it now.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, a great deal has been said about restricting the power of and interfering with the President of the United States. It is said that he must not be expected to give notice of hearings, that the whole matter of who is to be affected or what is to be effected must be kept in the background, must be kept in the dark in order to enable him properly to consummate these proposed treaties.

The only effect of my amendment would be to provide that there should be public hearings in each and every case, except when the President declares it is not in the public interest to hold such public hearings. The President would not be tied in any way, he would not be interfered with in any way, but he would have to give any interested party the benefit of a public hearing or he would have to make the declaration that it was not in the public interest to hold such a hearing.

Mr. President, I believe that industry, and those interested in industry, are entitled to hearings.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the Senator appreciates the fact that under a provision already adopted the President would have a right to have a public hearing, if he so desired, under rules and regulations to be provided.

Mr. BARBOUR. I appreciate that, but——

Mr. HARRISON. That is exactly what the Senator is getting at.

Mr. BARBOUR. No; it is not; I disagree with the Senator, if he will permit. I feel that under the present provision there will be no public hearings in any case. Even should the amendment I am suggesting be adopted, there would probably be no public hearings either, but at least the President would have to declare in each instance that a public hearing would be against the public interest. That, after all, can be the only reason for withholding a public hearing, anyway.

I shall not take more time in debating this particular question. I think the amendment is pertinent; I think it is fair; and at the proper time I shall want to have a vote on it, and I will ask for a vote on it at the proper time.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I have no desire to participate in the debate at this point, but a remark by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] about the price of sugar directly after the war interested me very much. The Senator stated that right after the war the people of this country were compelled to pay about 30 cents a pound for sugar.

If my recollection serves me aright, sugar was then being rationed to the people of this country at about 20 cents a pound. The records indicate that at the time the people of this country were being sweated for that frightful price the Government had on hand 22,000,000 pounds of sugar, which it elected to sell to the French Government for 2 cents a pound, instead of selling it at a reasonable figure to the people of this country

There was no occasion for the high price of sugar which the Senator from Louisiana has mentioned, for there was in the possession of the Government this great mass of sugar, 22,000,000 pounds, which could and should have been used at that time to break the strangle hold of the Sugar Trust and smash the price being gouged out of the people of this country. There is no answer to that argument. The Government had the sugar. The price which the American people were paying was an outrage, and this outrage was then being visited on the people of this country because the Government itself permitted the crime. Sugar tariffs had nothing to do with this story of loot. It was merely another example of how the people are trimmed to enrich manipulators in the necessities of life.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, before casting my vote for the pending measure, which is to grant for a limited time certain limited powers to the President of the United States to enter into reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations, through use of the flexible tariff provisions of the act, I desire to state briefly my reasons for so doing.

Years ago, probably during my school days, I was much interested in the story of a young ruler named Alexander. The story went, as I remember, that there was a knotted rope in a temple which no man had ever been able to untie or unravel. The prize from the gods to him who could undo the knot was power. Alexander, it seems, looked at the knot, tested it once or twice, then calmly drew his sword and cut the Gordian knot. Later he conquered the then-known world.

Mr. President, I am a firm believer in the protective tariff. But it has seemed to me ever since we enacted the latest tariff act—and I voted for that measure very largely because it contained the grant of some flexible tariff powers to the Chief Executive—that the United States has a Gordian knot to undo in the matter of interference with world trade by tariffs, quotas, embargoes, and similar trade restrictions.

I do not agree with those who maintain that the high-protection tariff policies of the United States are the sole or even the principal cause of the stagnation of world trade. There are many causative factors, which it is not necessary to discuss at this time. But there is little doubt in my mind that no matter what those other causes are, no matter to what extent they might be removed or modified, the world-wide prevalence of high tariffs, quotas, embargoes, and similar trade restrictions stands in the way of a substantial resumption of world trade.

There was a time when we stood alone among the great nations of the world in respect to a high-proective tariff policy. Today the world has adopted that policy. World trade is effectually stifled. One of our problems is to make possible a revival of world trade.

Theoretically this Nation is in better shape than any other great nation to become self-sufficient. But the price we would have to pay, in the shape of control of production, regimentation of agriculture, industry, and people is dreadful to contemplate. It is not only dreadful to contemplate; it seems to me practically impossible of accomplishment. So in deciding what to do on this question, I am taking the position that it is desirable to revive world trade.

The traditional way of changing our tariff schedules is through Congress rewriting the tariff act. I am not enough of a constitutional lawyer to argue with those who maintain that the only constitutional way is for Congress itself to agree upon each and every item in the tariff schedules. I do not agree with them, but I have no hope of converting them. So I am not going into that phase of the matter from a legalistic point of view, except to remark that always the Constitution is the last refuge of the obstructionist.

I am even willing to admit that back in the eighties, when James G. Blaine was advocating reciprocal tariff agreements to retain our even then lagging farm-export trade, the job could have been done by Congress. The rest of the world was not on a similar high-tariff basis; nor had the other countries of the world given to boards and councils and executives the power to change tariff schedules overnight.

I am even willing to admit that a decade later, when President William McKinley, at Buffalo, a few minutes before he was assassinated, advocated reciprocal trade agreements and the use of the tariff to stimulate world trade, that was a job which conceivably Congress might successfully have undertaken.

But today, Mr. President, we face a much more difficult situation. Indubitably, if we continue our present high-tariff rates, the other nations of the world will keep their high-tariff rates, and perhaps erect even additional barriers against us. It seems to me equally evident that if the United States reduces its tariff walls on its own, our markets will be swamped with a devastating flood of foreign goods, without any compensating foreign markets for any of our own products on equitable tariff terms.

It seems fairly obvious, then, that if world trade is to be stimulated and our own export trade is to be revived by means of changes in tariff schedules, reciprocal action by ourselves and other countries involved is absolutely necessary; and it looks to me as if that means the result will have to be obtained by negotiated reciprocal-trade agreements.

In passing, I might say that I am not one of those who believe that through this legislation, and through the use of its powers, our export trade is all going to be restored; I am only hopeful that it will be helped. We will be better off with the President exercising these powers, in my judgment, than we will be with no power vested anywhere to enter into such agreements and make the agreements promptly effective. It is my information, in this connection, that in the last 3 or 4 years those countries which are in a position to use, and which have used, the trade agreements have done a much better job of regaining their export trade than we have. In fact, I am told that 8 or 9 of the 11 large countries which have entered into such agreements actually have increased their exports over 1929, while ours, as everyone knows, have dropped tremendously.

Mr. President, as I stated before, the traditional way to rewrite the tariff laws is for Congress to revise the tariff schedules. But if reciprocal-trade agreements are to be negotiated, it does not look as if Congress, from the practical viewpoint, is qualified, or even able, to undertake the task. These agreements will have to be negotiated by some agency of Government with certain bargaining power, and, after canvassing the situation in my own mind, the executive branch of the Government seems to be the only logical agency.

As a matter of fact, if the job is only to revise the tariff schedules, if bargaining with other nations is left out of the picture, our experience in writing tariff legislation, particularly in the post-war era, has been discouraging. Trading between groups and sections is inevitable. Logrolling is inevitable, and in its most pernicious form. We do not write a national tariff law. We jam together, through various unholy alliances and combinations, a potpourri or hodgepodge of section and local tariff rates, which often add to our troubles and increase world misery. For myself, I see no reason to believe that another attempt would result in a more happy ending.

I have no assurance, though I have some hopes, that a President responsible to the Nation as a whole can and will enter into trade agreements from the national viewpoint. But I do have grave doubts, judging from past experience, that the Congress can write a national tariff act. I am also hopeful that under the provisions of this act, limited in its time operations as it is, the President will not allow agriculture to be traded down the river in any agreements made. That is what I have seen in the past when industry and manufacturing logrolled tariff schedules into existing and past tariff acts.

I am willing to stake my Republicanism on the stand taken by that great Republican President, William McKinley, I quote from his speech at Buffalo:

> A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in the fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing.

Farther back in our tariff history, I point to Alexander Hamilton himself, and to James G. Blaine; to a line of legislation reaching as far back as 1794, in support of trade agreements with foreign nations.

William McKinley did not pioneer when he pointed out the advisability of reciprocity in tariffs. Neither was he the last of the Republicans to realize and state the necessity for using our tariffs to stimulate and promote our export trade, instead of mainly to foster monopolies of already overfed industries, and to build up certain industrial sections and industries at the expense of other sections and of agriculture.

President William Howard Taft believed in tariff reciprocity. I might even call Ogden Mills of New York, former Secretary of the Treasury, the latest Republican to wear the mantle of Alexander Hamilton, in support of a serious modification of the Republican attitude on the tariff. In a speech on Kansas Day at Topeka last January, Mr. Mills, by implication at least, approved the objective of this measure—I understand he does not approve the measure itself. At any rate, he said at Topeka:

> We will have to abandon the present policy of isolation and intense nationalism and to some extent modify recent tariff practices. This may sound strange, coming from an orthodox Republican, but I have never understood that a sound system of protection, based upon the cost of production at home and abroad, if intelligently applied, means the erection of impassable tariff barriers, the destruction of our commerce with the rest of the world, and the sacrifice of the efficient farmer to save the inefficient manufacturer.

I desire to quote one more sentence from Mr. Mills.

> I am prepared to take my stand—

Mr. Mills said at Topeka last January—> with a great Republican President, who, in his last speech, delivered in Buffalo just before his assassination, said—and Mr. Mills quoted from the McKinley speech, using the language to which I myself have already referred.

Mr. President, within the last month another Republican, Henry L. Stimson, former Secretary of State, went further than Mr. Mills, who sat on the Cabinet with him. Mr. Stimson, in addition to approving the objectives of this measure, endorsed the measure itself and urged that it be enacted into law. Mr. Stimson takes the view—one I already have expressed briefly— that resumption of world trade through reciprocal-trade agreements is much preferable to the regimentation and Government control of industry that will be necessary if we are to continue our isolationist policy. Like myself, also, he doubts the practicability of arriving at these trade agreements through congressional action.

Mr. Stimson points out, and I quote his language, that—

> In each of these other nations the power to handle their commercial relations is very differently organized from the way in which it is organized in our Government. They have vested far greater powers of initiative in their executives.
> To deal with a world so organized, our Government at present is at a hopeless disadvantage. Many of the steps which they take and the things which they do are arrangements dictated by emergencies of the present situation. But, on the other hand, many of such arrangements may result in permanently fixing the channels of future trade; and at present, due to the faultiness of our machinery, the United States is being shouldered out of those arrangements and left with the likelihood of permanently losing most of the foreign trade which otherwise it might and could get.

That is what Mr. Stimson says.

Mr. President, it is a matter of regret to me that there are those who are considering this as a partisan measure. But to any who may insist that the test of Republicanism consists in opposing this measure, I will only say that to my mind the Republican tariff doctrine of the future will be more nearly in line with the principle and objectives of this measure, and that a Republican leadership which refuses to recognize the necessity of modifying the Republican tariff policy of recent years—that leadership is due for a downfall. It will be replaced by a leadership which will pick up the tariff principles of Hamilton, of Blaine, of McKinley, aye and of Taft. And I would suggest to them that they face that fact and act accordingly. I say this as one who always has been a staunch supporter of the protective-tariff principle and who will continue to support it.

Mr. President, there is another angle to this situation to which I must refer briefly. Amid all the confusion and confused thinking, the panics, and the panicky actions which have been the aftermath of the World War, there are two theories advanced which my mind refuses to accept as facts.

One is that there is not an actual market abroad for American products, particularly foodstuffs, if trade barriers could be removed and the monetary systems adjusted to facilitate trade. The other is that nationalism carried to the absurd end of isolation has come to stay, permanently.

If either or both of these theories are correct, if our export trade is gone forever, if isolation is practically to end world trade—if these things happen, then it is inevitable that we must ultimately do what Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, points out in his America Must Choose—that is, we must work out and enforce a planned economy that will take from 50,000,000 to 100,000,000 acres of farm land out of cultivation in America.

I cannot accept any such conclusion. My mind and soul revolt against any such extreme program. It can be tried only as a last desperate resort; and then probably will fail. The American people will not stand for it. We ought not to continue a policy that will force them to attempt it, other than purely as a temporary program.

There is a surplus population in Europe that can continue to exist peacefully only if we have world trade, and much more world trade than we have now. If and when world trade is revived—and we should pursue diligently and intelligently means of reviving it—there will be some market in Europe for our farm products. Not the markets we had during the World War, of course; not the same market we had before the World War, even; but a much bigger market than we have had during the past few years.

But it will be an exchange market, a trading market, not just a selling market. And it seems to me that we should face this as a reality and face it realistically. And facing it realistically means, for one thing, that any sound program must include reciprocal trade agreements as a means of lowering the trade barriers that have been erected to impossible heights since the war.

So, Mr. President, I intend to support the bill, though deeply regretful that the amendment insuring protection to agriculture against reductions has not been included. The agricultural States will hold the President responsible for protecting their interests and the national welfare in this respect.

Before closing however, I wish to call attention to the following resolution, adopted last month by the executive committee of the Farm Bureau Federation at its annual meeting in Washington. The resolution reads:

> We hereby endorse tariff bill, H.R. 8687, to give the President authority to negotiate reciprocal tariff agreements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. CAPPER. I believe I have 10 minutes on the amendment and 10 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; 10 minutes on the amendment and the bill.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed as a part of my remarks an editorial from the Kansas City Star.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Kansas City Star]

It seems hard to believe that in the light of the experience of the last 12 years, tariff policy in the United States there should still be regarded as a clean-cut party issue, with the choice lying between the ultraprotectionism of recent Republican practices and the tariff-for-revenue tendencies of the traditional Democratic theory.

The disastrous results of tariff legislation drafted without regard to its effect upon the export trade of the United States have thoroughly discredited the kind of protectionism that was in vogue through the last three Republican administrations, with, it should be added, valuable aid from certain Democratic Congressmen.

That policy, for example, virtually ruined the foreign market for the surplus farm products of the Middle West, both by encouraging retaliatory tariffs abroad and by making it increasingly difficult for our foreign customers to pay for their purchases in goods.

Even a Republican leader like Ogden Mills, the former Secretary of the Treasury, admitted, by implication at least, the error of his party's recent policy on tariffs in his Kansas Day address at Topeka. On the other hand, the present leaders of the Democratic Party have altered its policy toward the tariff problem. The tariff-for-revenue has given way to that of tariffs for bargaining.

As a matter of fact, the present state of international trade and the evident interests of the United States today, with respect to its tariff schedules, are such as to make the traditional policies of both political parties either undesirable or meaningless. This country finds itself today on a high-tariff basis in a world that, in general, has adopted similar protectionist policies, with the result that all international trade is retarded.

The immediate problem is to revive that trade, for the benefit of every country concerned.

Clearly, if the United States continues with its present system of high duties, other countries are quite unlikely to reduce their tariff and other barriers against world goods. It is equally evident that the United States cannot afford to reduce its schedules and admit more foreign goods, without compensating advantages for its own products abroad. Obviously then, if international trade is to be stimulated and our own export trade is to be revived, there must be reciprocal action on the part of this and other countries, probably through bilateral or regional agreements, looking to the simultaneous lowering of barriers.

For the negotiation of such agreements, some agency, representing the United States, must have a certain degree of bargaining power, and the logical agency is the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, several times during the course of this debate the attention of the Senate has been called to the fact that there has been a decline in the price of wool on account of fear of a reduction in the tariff, which is possible under the terms of the bill, and that on account of this fear buyers were refusing to purchase. It has also been stated on the floor of the Senate that a statement has been given out to the effect that the wool men have no need to fear what may happen to them if this bill becomes a law. Numerous newspapers have published articles stating that certain Senators had some sort of assurance from the President. I shall take but a minute, but I desire to read to the Senate two letters which make me believe that there is some misunderstanding as to the promise made regarding wool.

The first letter is from E. S. Mayer, vice president of the National Wool Growers' Association. It was written from Washington on May 17 and addressed to the President. The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 17, 1934.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The woolgrowers of the country naturally have been deeply concerned over the proposed amendments to the tariff act as included in H.R. 8687.

Statements and testimony by the Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of State, and the Chairman of the Tariff Commission have given us grounds to expect that duties on imported wools may be reduced when the pending bill becomes law.

An article appearing in the San Angelo (Tex.) Morning Times of May 11 attributes to you a statement which would be very reassuring to us. This article quotes you as saying, "No woolgrower need fear the administration of the tariff-bargaining authority." A copy of this article is attached.

Since we have not seen this statement elsewhere, we respectfully inquire as to whether it is authentic and expresses your views and policies.

I expect to be in Washington, at the Willard Hotel, until May 22. Thereafter I shall be at my home in San Angelo, Tex.

Yours respectfully,

E. S. MAYER,
Vice President, National Wool Growers Association.

In reply to this letter Mr. Mayer received the following letter:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 23, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. MAYER: Reference is made to your letter of May 17.

It is possible that the President may have made the statement, attributed to him in your letter, to a group of Senators. It does not appear in any formal release.

Sincerely yours,

M. H. MCINTYRE,
Assistant Secretary to the President.

E. S. MAYER, Esq.,
Vice President, National Wool Growers Association,
San Angelo, Tex.

Mr. President, I have no reason to believe that the Senators who were responsible for the statement regarding wool did not so understand the President. It is apparent that there is some misunderstanding somewhere. It is certain that the secretary of the President could have easily found out if the President made such a promise, or, if the President desired to confirm the statement attributed to him, that he would have done so. It is perfectly apparent from the letter addressed to the President, and the reply by his secretary, that no assurance as to wool given out as coming from the White House is binding on the administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] would prevent any reciprocal trade agreement going into effect until approved by act of Congress. The substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] likewise would prevent any such agreement from becoming effective until after it had been submitted to Congress for a period of 30 days, unless in the meantime the Congress, by a majority of both Houses, should approve the agreement.

Those who favor this proposed legislation, who believe that it is designed and calculated to promote the revival of trade and commerce, should not be deceived into supporting either of those amendments. The primary purpose of the reciprocal tariff legislation is to provide a means by which the country may have the advantage of prompt action, as prompt as is practicable under the circumstances, in entering into arrangements of mutual benefit to this country and to the foreign country which the trade agreement affects. If every agreement must be submitted to the Congress and remain in abeyance for a period of 30 days while the Congress is in session, it is apparent that the primary purpose of the legislation will be, in part, at least, defeated. If the amendment of the Senator from California should be agreed to, it is not very likely that reciprocal trade agreements would be disposed of by the Congress in sufficient number and within the time necessary to build up the foreign commerce of the United States.

What is desired by advocates of the legislation is a method that has already been tried, a method with which the public is familiar, a method well known to the Congress of the United States, by which the Executive may work out arrangements and put them into effect.

All the debate here in opposition to the pending bill is based on the theory that the proposed legislation is really wrong, that the power ought not to be given to the Executive, that he should not be permitted to negotiate trade agreements without express approval of the agreements by the Congress—both Houses. If we are to accomplish the fundamental purpose which inspired the preparation and presentation of this proposed legislation, we should vote down the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming and the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

I realize that it has often been said during the course of this debate that Congress is giving away its power, is minimizing its own responsibility. There is no Senator here who believes that the legislative body is equipped for the negotiation of treaties or trade agreements. There is no Senator who does not know that such matters require careful study. There is no Senator who believes that the present President will promote such arrangements as are calculated and designed to injure any industry in this country. If any Senator so believes, then the correct course for him is to vote against the pending legislation. If it be desired to make the proposed legislation effective, if it be desired to afford the opportunity for reviving the trade and commerce of the United States through arrangements such as those that are to be effected by reciprocal-trade agreements, then Senators should vote down both amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], to the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to perfect the amendment which has been offered by me. In line 3 I propose to strike out the words "and specifically approved by law", and to add the following:

by the President and approved by both the House and Senate, by majority vote. The vote on such agreements shall be taken within 20 days after the President submits the agreement to the Congress.

So that the entire amendment will read:

SEC. —. No foreign-trade agreement entered into under the provisions of this Act shall become effective until submitted to the Congress by the President and approved by both the House and Senate, by majority vote. The vote on such agreements shall be taken within 20 days after the President submits the agreement to the Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if my time has not expired, I should like, in my time, to ask the Senator from California a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be very glad to answer, if I can.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The change which the Senator from California has made in the amendment, among other things, requires that the Congress shall vote on a trade agreement within 20 days after the agreement shall be sent to the Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator think that a provision of that nature would be self-executing? How would the Senator expect that if either House should decline to take the vote the requirement could be enforced?

Mr. JOHNSON. If either House should decline to take a vote, of course, then the agreement would be in force.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think that the language would accomplish any such purpose as that. That is the reason I asked the question. Then, the effect of the Senator's amendment, if that were the effect of it, would be to modify the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. JOHNSON. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Wyoming proposes to give 30 days and provides that if the agreement shall not be voted on in 30 days then it shall become effective, while the amendment of the Senator from California, as modified, gives 20 days and requires that the votes shall be taken within that time; but there is no way of which I know to make such a provision effective.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator has misapprehended the particular amendment. It is the amendment which was suggested by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] when first my amendment was presented to this body, and the addendum that has been placed upon it is the addendum desired by him. The amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Wyoming is not of this entire character, although he does provide a 30-day period in his substitute, but within which no action is required. This amendment requires action within 20 days, and by a majority vote only.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, suppose there is no action taken within the 20 days, then what happens?

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the consent of the Congress is implied, and nothing more need be done.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think exactly the contrary is implied.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that is the point, or one of the points, I am making. There is no consent of Congress implied; there is no language in the amendment from which such an implication could arise. Here is the language of the amendment:

> The vote on such agreements shall be taken within 20 days after the President submits the agreement to the Congress.

There is no implication there, if the vote is not taken within 20 days or if it is not taken at all, that the agreement goes into effect. Anyone by filibustering could prevent an agreement from going into effect within the 20 days.

Mr. JOHNSON. The very purpose of the limitation was to prevent anything of that sort.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator tell me how that is accomplished by the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have taken this language from the Senator from Washington.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It has come almost to be a habit here for Senators to take other Senators' amendments——

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And then disclaim responsibility for them.

Mr. JOHNSON. In this instance I think the amendment accomplishes the purpose desired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator answer me a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will endeavor to answer any question the Senator may propound.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. From what language in the amendment, as the Senator has revised it, does he, as a lawyer, assert that the implication arises that an agreement will go into effect unless acted upon by Congress within 20 days?

Mr. JOHNSON. Inasmuch as the Senator from Arkansas is so concerned about the particular language, I will accept any language he may desire to suggest.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; the Senator will not do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am not trying to help the Senator from California have his amendment adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am doing what I can to defeat his amendment, but I do not want him to get votes either on his side of the Chamber or on this side on the erroneous theory that the language he employs carries an implication which I am sure, when he reconsiders the language, he will agree it does not carry.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right. Now let us read it, although I think neither one of us is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think my time has expired, if we are speaking in my time.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator from Arkansas spoke twice, which is not permitted under the rule. We either ought to have the rule adhered to or we ought to abandon it. The rule specifically provides that a Senator may speak only once and both Senators have spoken more than once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas requested that he be permitted to ask the Senator from California a question.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from California had exhausted his time also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is not advised as to the number of times the Senator from California has spoken.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am merely going to read the amendment and then the Senate may determine the question for itself. I will not argue it, because I think we are both out of order; but the amendment is this:

> No foreign-trade agreement entered into under the provisions of this act shall become effective until submitted to the Congress by the President and approved by both the House and the Senate by a majority vote. The vote on such agreements shall be taken within 20 days after the President submits the agreement to the Congress.

That is the amendment, which is complete in itself and does exactly what it is designed to do.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I want the floor in my own right. I have not spoken on this amendment as yet.

It seems perfectly apparent that as perfected by his own perfecting amendment, the amendment of the Senator from California does precisely what the Senator from Arkansas said it would do, and that is to prevent any trade agreement, which might be negotiated under the terms of the bill, from going into effect until Congress shall have approved it by specific legislative act. The amendment provides:

> No foreign-trade agreement entered into under the provisions of this act shall become effective until submitted to the Congress by the President—> and approved by both the House and Senate by majority vote. The vote on such agreements to be taken within 20 days after the President submits the agreement to the Congress.

That is one element. Then it continues—

I take it that neither the Senator from California nor any other Member of this body would contend that Congress now has the right to modify by law the specific provision of the Constitution that each body of the Congress shall have the right to make rules governing its own procedure. Therefore the Congress has no right to provide by this bill that a vote shall be taken in either body within 20 days after submission of any trade agreement by the President of the United States. In other words, the effect of the amendment is to render absolutely nugatory and to render ridiculous the enactment of the proposed legislation at all.

I have no quarrel with the Senator from California. He is opposed to the bill. I have no quarrel with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. He is opposed to the bill. I have no quarrel with any Senator who on this floor is opposed to the entire type of legislation embodied in the bill. I submit it would be much more fair and much more frank to offer an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, that it would be much more fair and much more frank to go to the people on the issue of defeating the proposed legislation; but to come here and undertake to defeat the legislation by indirection is an issue which should be known to every Senator when he casts his vote on the amendment.

The only theory upon which the pending legislation is submitted to the Congress is that the nations of the world have gotten themselves into a very sad snarl by their competition in tariff regulation and their competition in quota regulations. It is the opinion of the proponents of the measure that this regrettable situation cannot be worked out by the cumbersome process of legislation either in the Congress or in any other parliamentary body of the world. The whole theory of the legislation and the only justification that has ever been urged for it is that it will afford facilities for negotiation to unravel the snarl into which all the nations have gotten themselves. If a Senator is opposed to unraveling the situation which exists in the world today, which involves the United States and other nations of the world, if he thinks they are now in a desirable situation, and if he desires to perpetuate this system of prohibitive-tariff competition, then he ought to vote against the bill or move to strike out all after the enacting clause.

I submit to the Members of this body that there is no justification for anybody who believes in the theory of working out the problem by negotiation to vote either for the amendment of the Senator from California as perfected or for the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in my own time I should like to ask the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] a question, which can be answered yes or no. Would not the effect of his amendment be to prevent the execution of any agreement except during a session of Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, necessarily I could not advise the Senator. I wonder if the Senator from Missouri recalls the Norris amendment to the Simmons amendment of 1929? It answers what has been suggested about the rules of the Congress.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no doubt about the theory of the amendment of the Senator from California, and I feel that it fully carries out the purpose the Senator has in mind. However, in order to satisfy the critics, whose ranks are rapidly thinning, I am going to suggest something which I think can be understood. Following the language submitted by the Senator from California, I propose, in deference to some of the critical Members of the Senate, to add the following:

In the event Congress shall fail to act within said period of 20 days, then such agreement shall thereupon be in full force and effect.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. What is the implication of the expression "if Congress is not in session"? Does it mean that the agreement would be held over until Congress should be in session?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly. I have no reason to doubt that. If an agreement should be consummated during the vacation of Congress, it would have to wait until the Congress reassembled, and then would have to be considered within 20 days before final action could be taken or before the agreement could become effective.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon if he will have his amendment read at the desk?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly. I ask that the clerk may read my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

In the event Congress shall fail to act within said period of 20 days, then such agreement shall thereupon be in full force and effect.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator if that is in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. McNARY. I think that is the real intent and purpose and is in language a proper construction of the desire of the Senator from California. I only suggest it as an assurance against doubt.

Mr. BORAH. It is too much of an assurance against doubt to suit me. In other words, unless Congress acts within a certain time, the agreement becomes effective?

Mr. McNARY. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment both in its imperfect form and in its perfect form, because I think we might as well move to lay the bill on the table or postpone it indefinitely as to adopt such an amendment in any form.

One of the reasons why the bill is before us now is because of the well-recognized inability of Congress to act promptly in an emergency of this character. If we are going to destroy the ability of the President to act promptly we might as well quit wasting our time in debating the bill at all. Suppose the amendment of the Senator from California or any other amendment of the kind should be attached to the bill; suppose that between now and next January the President should be able to negotiate as many as 20 trade agreements which would be to the immense advantage of the American people; suppose the conditions should be such that in order to reap those advantages the agreements ought to take effect in July or August of this year; under this amendment or any other amendment of the kind they could not take effect until probably next February.

In addition to that it would probably be a deterrent against any other nation negotiating any trade agreement with the United States. For instance, in 1897, during a Republican administration, more than seven agreements were negotiated under a law which was enacted by a Republican Congress. Not one of those agreements was ever ratified. What encouragement has any nation to go to the trouble of negotiating with the United States a treaty on trade relations, exposing their trade situation to us in the negotiations, when they know if it is submitted to Congress it may never be ratified, or if it is ratified it may be postponed until all the benefits growing out of the trade arrangements will be nullified?

I believe if the amendment or any similar amendment shall be adopted there will never be a trade agreement negotiated between this country and any other nation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senator, which I know is limited. I merely want to invite his attention to the fact that under the Tariff Act of 1897, which provided both for trade agreements and for reciprocal treaties requiring action of the Senate, all the trade agreements went into effect and were upheld by the courts, and that none of the treaties requiring action by the Senate was ever ratified.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was coming to that. As I said earlier in the day, sections 3 and 4 of the act of 1897 provided for trade agreements which did not have to come back for action by Congress, and in another section the act provided for trade agreements which had to be ratified by the Senate. As the Senator from Missouri has reminded me, all the trade agreements which were negotiated which did not have to come back to Congress went into effect and were upheld by the courts, while not one of those that had to come back to Congress and be ratified was ever put into effect, because not one was ratified.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Was the power given to the Executive in those instances to make rates?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; it was not. A certain long list of imports was set out in section 3 of the act of 1897, and the authority given to the President was to negotiate trade agreements, upon the consummation of which the rates set out in section 3 were to take effect. Section 4 provided for the return of the treaties or agreements to the Senate for ratification; but, Mr. President, even in 1890 or 1897, the two most recent instances of conferring this authority upon the President, we were not involved in anything approaching the national or international trade emergency that now exists in this country and in the world.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield, though I have only a few minutes.

Mr. BLACK. I know the Senator has, and I shall be very brief.

The Senator asked about rates. The President now has the power—for we all know that he can control the Tariff Commission; everybody knows it—to raise or lower rates 50 percent. This bill does not give him any more power than that, does it?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no. So far as rates are concerned, he will operate under the same limitation of 50 percent under which he now operates in connection with the Tariff Commission.

The difference is that under the present law the President is not given authority to act except upon a report from the Tariff Commission, whereas under the bill now before us he could act upon information from all departments of the Government with respect to all matters of commerce upon which he might be able to negotiate a trade agreement with any nation in the world.

I say frankly that if this amendment or any similar amendment shall be adopted to this bill—although it is inconceivable that there will be enough votes to adopt it—if it shall be put into the bill by the Senate, in my judgment it will not be in the bill when it shall be enacted. If it should be in the bill when enacted it would defeat the entire purpose of the bill itself, and we might as well vote to kill the bill, because it would not accomplish anything. No trade agreement would ever be entered into. Not a carload of freight would originate in the United States and be sent to any other nation under this bill if this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think it would be impossible to make a trade agreement which Congress would approve?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not think it would be impossible, but I think it would be improbable, especially as this amendment does not change the rules of the Senate of the United States. An act of Congress does not change the rules of our procedure. It may be that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], which is entirely different from the interpretation that I place upon the amendment of the Senator from California, might automatically put the trade agreements into effect 20 days after they were submitted if Congress had not acted upon them; but under the language of the amendment submitted by the Senator from California there is no provision whatever as to what would happen after the 20 days. Any man or group of men might occupy enough time under the rules of the Senate to make it impossible to bring about a vote under the 20-day limitation originally incorporated in the amendment of the Senator from California; and my interpretation is that in that event the treaties, instead of going into effect, would be null and void.

I do not recall whether or not the Senator from California accepted the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I did not offer an amendment. I simply suggested it, and left to the judgment of the Senator from California what he desired to do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then it is not before us?

Mr. McNARY. No; not formally.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the present language of the amendment I do not think it is open to any interpretation except that the 20-day provision is a mere direction to Congress. The provision that unless the treaties shall be ratified by a majority vote of both Houses they will not go into effect is just as valid as if the 20-day provision were not there. It simply directs Congress to act within 20 days; but if it does not act within 20 days, there is still the provision there that the treaties cannot take effect until they are ratified by both Houses by a majority vote.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator think it could be provided that the two Houses shall vote within 20 days?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not think any law can make the Senate vote within any limit of time until it desires to do so.

Mr. DILL. Suppose the Senate should pass such a law?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senate might pass such a law at this session, but there is no way to prevent any group of Senators in the next session from talking for 20 days or for any other length of time so that there never would be a vote; and if there never were a vote under this amendment, the treaties automatically would be dead, not automatically alive.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator remember in 1929 voting for an amendment to the flexible provision of the tariff bill which prescribed exactly how the amendment should be treated before the Congress, and provided that nothing should be germane to that particular amendment save what was in the original agreement or the original flexible tariff rates then fixed?

Mr. BARKLEY. I remember that amendment; but I remember, also, that the amendment provided that if there were no action by Congress within, I believe, 60 days, the status of the proclamation was described and defined, and it was not left in mid-air, as this amendment leaves it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me say to the Senator that his recollection is entirely at fault.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think so.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask the Senator to look it up.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not time to do so while I am speaking.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have the amendment here, and it does not do any such thing.

Mr. BARKLEY. What does it do?

Mr. JOHNSON. What I am calling to the Senator's attention is the fact that the amendment prescribed the rule of action of the House and of the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. And then it provided definitely what would be the effect of no action, or of favorable action, or of unfavorable action.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; it did not do anything of the sort. We can do that here, however, if the Senator wants to do it. I do not object.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am talking about the amendment as it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. The objection has been made that we could not alter rules or prescribe rules by law. Why, of course we can. Congress can do it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I still insist——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] some language to which I think the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] probably will agree.

On April 1, 1932, an amendment was offered as a substitute by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in which the language I am about to read was used. I am particularly anxious that the Senator from Kentucky shall have his recollection refreshed with respect to the tariff bill of 1932 by section 4 of that bill; and I wish to suggest this language to the Senator from California, because I assume that it will be satisfactory to the other side:

SEC. 4. International Economic Conference: That the President is respectfully requested to initiate a movement for an International Economic Conference with a view to (a) lowering excessive tariff duties and eliminating discriminatory and unfair trade practices, and other economic barriers affecting international trade, (b) preventing retaliatory tariff measures and economic wars, and (c) promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations between nations; but with the understanding that any agreement, treaty, or arrangement which changes any tariff then in existence or in any way affects the revenue of the United States must first be approved by the Congress of the United States.

The President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested, at as early a date as may be convenient to proceed to negotiate with foreign governments reciprocal trade agreements under a policy of mutual tariff concessions. Such agreements shall not become operative until Congress by law shall have approved them.

In the same bill there was a provision which maintained the flexible provision of the tariff, and also provided that nothing recommended by the Tariff Commission should be effective until approved by the Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. It also gave full power, however, to take a commodity from the free list and put it on the dutiable list, or to take it from the dutiable list and put it on the free list, which is not included in this proposal.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator from Mississippi mean to urge that as a distinction and the only distinction for the inconsistent position he now takes?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Mississippi certainly intends to urge it as quite a distinction, because under the present proposal the President can increase or reduce the rates only 50 percent. In that proposal which the Senator's President vetoed—and which, perhaps, if it had not been vetoed, would have become the law, and in that event perhaps we would not now be discussing this bill—we gave to the Commission the right to recommend to the Congress taking an article from the free list and putting it on the dutiable list, or taking an article from the dutiable list and putting it on the free list.

Mr. HASTINGS. At any rate, under the tariff bill of 1932 no agreement with any foreign country was to become effective until it had been approved by the Congress; and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the then distinguished Senator, who is now the Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, voted for that proposal. If it was important 2 years ago to have the Congress pass upon a reciprocal agreement made with a foreign country, I desire to know why it is not just as important in 1934 as it was in 1932.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to know why the Senator voted against that amendment in 1932.

Mr. HASTINGS. For every reason in the world. I was opposing the flexible provision of the tariff which brought the matter back to the Congress; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that was an entirely different proposition from this. The distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] undertook to make a distinction, and both the senior and the junior distinguished Senators from Kentucky argued that this was not a change of the tariff; this was not a taxing measure at all; this was an entirely different proposition. I must confess that I could not follow the distinguished Senator when, although admitting that both measures came under section 8 of article I of the Constitution—the one providing for the levying of taxes, and the other providing for the regulation of commerce—he undertook to make a distinction between the two, and called attention to the fact that the last paragraph of that section gave Congress the authority to make all laws necessary to carry into effect the powers granted by the section.

The distinguished junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] argued that because of that language of the section we might give the authority to the Senator from Ohio; we might do anything with it. The distinguished Senator from Illinois argued that we had made 77 such agreements, and that therefore we were not changing the policy at all. If the opportunity had been afforded me, I should have liked to challenge him to put into the RECORD evidence of a single agreement we have ever made at any time, anywhere, comparable to the agreements which might be made under the authority given here.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have only 2 or 3 minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator from Georgia was the only Senator on the other side, in my judgment, who stated properly the one ground the proponents of this measure had to depend upon to make it constitutional, that is, that it was specific; it must be a specific rule laid down, and as he talked about the specific rule laid down, and as I remembered that throughout this country, particularly in the last campaign, there had been a contest all over the land, those on the other side of the Chamber and those on this side distinctly disagreeing upon the question; then they laid down that issue upon which millions of people disagree, under which it is impossible to arrive at any definite fact, and the Senator from Georgia argued that that was a reason.

I have never been particularly anxious about the flexible provision of the tariff, but the Supreme Court had said that the rule we laid down, namely, using the difference between the costs of production at home and abroad, was a sufficient rule to guide the person who was given the authority to execute that particular order, such as the President of the United States, and it did not make any difference what the particular agency was. Under the pending measure there is no rule; we cannot have any rule in any such disagreement as will exist among the people of the country.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], the very first day of the debate, asked the specific question, "Where is the rule? Point out what it is?" Those on the other side say that they believe the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act prevents the extension of foreign trade. That is what they said. The President of the United States has already decided that question, because it is said in the Democratic platform, and he said he stood by that platform. That is the truth of it, and it simply means that there is no fact to be determined.

Talk about notice to people! No notice would bring forth any fact that would be helpful to the President. The fact has already been decided. There is nothing to be determined, and we are passing the matter over to the President to do exactly as he pleases with it.

I repeat, 2 years ago it was urged that before we made any such agreement as that we must get the consent of the Congress. None of us on this side ever contended that we ought to give the President of the United States, or any other person, this great authority, and I say that it will be interesting to those on the other side, it will be interesting to the country, to read the record of the votes on this particular measure, when those on the other side are now complaining about a provision that is not so drastic as that suggested by the Senator from California and upon which we are now about to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I seek to perfect the amendment by adding that which was submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY]. The whole is at the desk, and I ask to have it read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from California as modified.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

No foreign trade agreement entered into under the provisions of this act shall become effective until submitted to the Congress by the President and approved by both the House and Senate by majority vote. The vote on such agreements shall be taken within 20 days after the President submits the agreement to the Congress. In the event that Congress shall fail to act within such period of 20 days, then said agreement shall thereupon be in full force and effect.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is necessarily detained, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERTON (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] and vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absences, as previously announced by me, of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. I am authorized to say that were the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] present and voting he would vote "nay."

I also wish to announce that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained at the White House.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] on this question. I am informed that if the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] were present he would vote "yea", and that if the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] were present he would vote "nay."

I also wish to announce that if present and voting the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas, 34, nays 50, as follows:

So Mr. JOHNSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 15, after the word "than", it is proposed to strike out all down to and including "notice", in line 18, and to insert in lieu thereof "6 months next after the expiration of 3 years from the date of the enactment hereof."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, if this amendment should be adopted, paragraph (b), on page 5 of the bill, would read as follows:

> Every foreign trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination, upon due notice to the foreign government concerned, at the end of not more than 6 months next after the expiration of 3 years from the date of the enactment hereof.

Mr. President, some days ago, in addressing myself to this bill generally, I called attention to paragraph (b), which provides that the President may enter into 3-year agreements, the present language being "at the end of not more than 3 years from the date on which the agreement comes into force."

I think, when this bill was introduced, the general impression was that it would give the President authority to enter into 3-year contracts, the 3 years being put in the bill for the purpose of emphasizing that this was an emergency measure; and, as I undertook to point out heretofore, unless some such change as this shall be made, it will be perfectly possible for the President to enter into agreements this month, we will say, which shall run until December 1936, being 2 years and 6 months, and then at the end of that time he could enter into another contract for 3 years, which could not be ended until after another 6 months; so we would have an authority in the President to enter into contracts which may extend to a period of 6 years instead of the common understanding of 3 years.

I am suggesting 3 years in my amendment because we are all hoping and assuming that certainly the emergency will be past by the end of 3 years. The effect of this amendment will be to prohibit any agreement from being entered into which cannot be terminated within 6 months after the expiration of 3 years from the date the bill goes into effect. In other words, it provides for a period of 3 years and 6 months from the time the agreement goes into effect instead of perhaps a period of 6 years, as I have undertaken to point out heretofore.

If this amendment shall go into effect and if an agreement shall not be entered into for 6 months from this date, while it may last as long as under the provisions of the bill indefinitely, it could be terminated at the end of 2 years and 6 months; so that if the President should not make an agreement until 1 year from now, that particular agreement could be terminated at the expiration of 2 years from that date.

I hope I have made my position clear. I do not care to argue the amendment further than I have.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that Congress will not have power to terminate these agreements whenever Congress gets ready to do so?

Mr. HASTINGS. If this shall be valid law I have no notion that Congress can cancel these agreements.

Mr. BORAH. Congress can pass another act the same as it can pass this act. We certainly cannot legislate so Congress cannot legislate again.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the President has authority and the President exercises the authority and enters into a valid agreement with a foreign government, I assume that Congress itself would not feel perfectly free to cancel it.

Mr. BORAH. That might be true as a matter of policy, but as a matter of authority it undoubtedly would have a right to pass the law. These people will take these agreements as the result of a legislative act, and if Congress sees fit it may repeal the act and terminate all agreements.

Mr. HASTINGS. I suppose it may be said that the Congress has the right to repudiate all the treaties which have been made with foreign countries.

Mr. BORAH. It has the right to terminate them; besides, bear in mind, the authors of this legislation claim these are not treaties but mere agreements.

Mr. HASTINGS. It has the right to terminate them regardless of their term, but I am assuming for the purpose of the discussion of this proposed legislation that if it be held to be constitutional, and these agreements are entered into, the people of this country will insist upon the agreements being lived up to. That is what I assume to be true.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be voted down, because if these agreements work, and are beneficial to the United States, I believe the American people will want them to continue a little longer, rather than to be terminable 6 months after the 3 years.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I am sure the distinguished chairman of the committee has not quite understood my amendment. It does not in any sense terminate them. It simply gives the right to terminate them.

Mr. HARRISON. I know it does not terminate them, but the Senator's amendment provides that 6 months after 3 years from the enactment of the legislation they shall be terminable. Under the proposal we make they are terminable after 3 years from the passage of the bill; and they can be canceled after 6 months' notice, and so forth, if they are not advantageous. It seems to me that if the effects are good, after the 3 years we may desire to continue some of these agreements. I can imagine now that my friend from Delaware will be in this Chamber 3 years from now, if he does not come up for election between now and that time—and I do not believe he does—and that we shall hear him pleading eloquently for the continuation of some of these agreements.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Mississippi is inconsistent with his own understanding of this amendment. He says the agreement is terminable. There is nothing in this amendment which changes the provision of the bill which says that "every foreign-trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination upon due notice to the foreign government concerned at the end of not more than", and so forth. There is nothing in the bill which makes an agreement terminable before that; but does not the Senator agree with me that it is possible under this bill as it stands for the present President to make two agreements with one country which will last for a period of 6 years, which cannot be terminated by another President?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, I think an agreement might last 6 years from the enactment of the act; but we have a right to cancel it at any time by giving notice, and so on.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HASTINGS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, did the Chair hold that the demand for the yeas and nays was not sufficiently seconded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; that was the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, Mr. President, we will help out those who made the demand, and will support it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well, Mr. President; I withdraw the request for a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement which I previously made with regard to my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as previously with respect to my pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and, in his absence, not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and its transfers as on previous votes, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to reannounce the absence of the Senators whose absence I announced earlier today, and for the reasons then given, to which on this vote I am authorized to say for the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] that if present he would vote "nay."

I wish further to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained at the White House, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] are necessarily absent on official business.

Mr. STEPHENS. Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT. I wish to announce the general pair of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]; also that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] by transfer. If present, the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 54, as follows:

So Mr. HASTINGS' amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I should like to call up an amendment to section 4 of the bill of which I gave notice about 3 months ago, and I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 10, after the word "designate", it is proposed to insert "at a public hearing, said hearing to be public unless the President shall determine and declare that a public hearing is not in the public interest and".

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am not going to speak any further on this amendment at this time as I have already discussed it earlier this afternoon, and I do not insist on a record vote because there are others who have amendments they wish to offer and the time is short, as we must have a final vote at 5 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, following section 4, it is proposed to add the following new section:

SEC. 5. That the terms of this act shall not be invoked as to any commodity, article, or merchandise which is necessary or essential to the proper equipment or supply of the Army, Navy, or the Public Health Service, or to any of their associated departments or corps.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am offering this amendment in the light of my memory of what happened in 1917 when the United States entered the World War. At that time, our Army and Navy, as well as local defense and training camps, were practically without certain types of scientific apparatus, such as hypodermic syringes, chemical glassware, coal-tar medicinals, and various other equipment on which we had relied for our supply wholly upon Germany and other foreign countries. In drafting the Tariff Act of 1922, Congress, with the full cooperation of the heads of the various branches of our Government, provided duties, upon the ground of national defense, which would foster an industry in this country in every line of war necessity against the day when, God forbid, we may be called upon to equip a vast army or provide for national defense. The record in Congress with reference to the Tariff Act of 1922 and again in 1930, will clearly show that these rates were not placed in the tariff act as a matter of political or industrial logrolling, but, as I have said, at the request of heads of Government departments. It would, therefore, seem to me to be extremely dangerous and against public policy to permit the provisions of this bill to apply to any article of supply or equipment necessary for those arms of our Government enumerated in this amendment which are so vitally interested in our national defense.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course if this amendment should be adopted, almost everything being connected in one way or another, directly or indirectly, with the Army and Navy and the Public Health Service, it would take about everything out of negotiation, and it would make the bill almost inoperative. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR. I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 18, it is proposed to insert the following:

And provided further, That nothing in this section shall apply to manufactured products of any country or countries which are produced and/or distributed by any producing and/or distributing agency, however and wherever formed and doing business, which is party to, or the subsidiary of a party to, any combination, agreement, cartel, or other arrangement designed or having the effect to promote monopoly, control prices and/or markets, or restrain trade, either in the country where such producing and/or distributing agency is located or elsewhere.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, in submitting this amendment, I should like to read an excerpt from a report written by Dr. C. C. Concannon, Chief of the Chemical Division, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce, as follows:

For the first time since Germany's pre-war supremacy, the European coal-tar dye industry presents a solid front in the trade marts of the world. Predominent national groups in the dye industries of Germany, Switzerland, France, Italy, Spain, and now Great Britain and Poland are directly linked in a general accord for the world-wide marketing of their projects. The pact, however, is only the framework of a control rendered more effective by the ramification of German, Swiss, and French plants in other producer countries, and through the interrelations of the administrative organizations of member groups with other industries subject to international agreements, the whole structure comprising a single complicated, but definitely woven, pattern centered around the world's largest dye producer.

The European dye cartel of today is the latest development of a careful plan initiated in 1927 as a Franco-German dye-marketing agreement, to which Swiss producers definitely became a party in 1929. Spain automatically came under the control of the convention when its dye industry was acquired by German interests, while German and Swiss ownership in Italian dye factories aided in the final inclusion of Italy in 1931. After years of negotiation, Great Britain recently became a signatory country, with Poland becoming the seventh and latest member of the entente. Only two European producers of importance remain outside the direct control of the pact—Russia, which is said to consume all of its own output, and Czechoslovakia, whose exports are comparatively insignificant in world trade.

This amendment is aimed at prevention of our entering into trade agreements with what is a recognized well-established international monopoly, in relation to dyes particularly. We talk a great deal here on the floor of the Senate about monopolies and how we must prevent monopolies. And always be against monopolies; everyone here is opposed to monopolies.

Now, we realize, if we are frank enough to admit it, that there is this great international well-organized combination in relation to the whole dye industry. I feel, therefore, it is only fair and sensible that the amendment should be adopted to prevent the United States Government doing what it would not allow its citizens to do; that is, entering into an agreement with this great monopoly.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the bill now before us does not in any wise affect section 337 of the tariff act which gives the President power to deal with unfair practices in foreign countries; neither does it affect section 338, where the President is given the power to fight monopolies. It seems to me we ought not to encumber the legislation with the question of cartels.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 6, after line 16, to insert the following:

SEC. 5. That upon all articles imported into the United States through a country contiguous to the United States, from another country foreign to the United States and transshipped from said contiguous country to the United States, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the importation of said articles into the United States a special tax or duty of 10 percent upon the value thereof. If said articles are otherwise subject by law to a duty, the special duty herein authorized shall be in addition thereto.

In the event that any country contiguous to the United States imposes on articles imported into that country through the United States from a country foreign to the United States and transshipped from the United States to said contiguous country, the same duties as would be imposed if the goods arrived directly at one of its own ports, then the provisions of this section, upon proclamation by the President, shall be suspended from time to time as to the contiguous country extending such reciprocal privileges.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it is quite impossible in the time at my disposal to discuss at any length the merits or demerits of the pending bill, but I desire my conclusion with respect to it to be a matter of record.

I am opposed to the proposed legislation. My opposition rests on principle, but in this particular instance adherence to principle is the easier because of my conviction that any trade agreement negotiated with Canada—and I believe such a trade arrangement is in contemplation—would be at the expense of the industry, of the agriculture, of the fisheries of my State, and of all the people thereof interested in and dependent thereon.

Mr. President, there are trade advantages other than those asserted to be found in this bill which can be secured to the United States through insistence upon equality of treatment in trade practices. The amendment which I have offered seeks such equality.

For many years imports entering the United States by way of Canada have done so upon precisely the same basis as the imports entering the United States directly through its own ports. But we find that since 1927 Canada has been according a preferential tariff rate on goods entering Canada direct through her own sea and river ports. The manifest purpose and the effect of this practice is to divert imports into Canada from American ships, American ports, and American railroads, to her own ports.

Originally this preference to Canada was reserved to members of the British Empire, but it has now been extended to the world. The precise effects of this Canadian policy cannot be stated. It is certain, however, that there has been a substantial shrinkage in Canadian importations through American ports in recent years. Specific instances of diversion since this preference has been given can be cited.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] called the attention of the Senate, a few years since, to the unhappy consequences of this Canadian policy upon the port of Boston and upon an American shipping company, Government vessels in fact, serving that port. He placed in the RECORD a statement covering four specific commodities showing the duties assessed when the goods moved through Canadian ports and the duties assessed when the goods moved into Canada via the United States. The difference in these duties was sufficient to preclude the possibility of an American ship and an American port securing this business.

Large quantities of bananas formerly shipped through Atlantic ports of the United States into Canada under the preferential system could be imported direct through a Canadian port at a tariff charge of 50 cents less per bunch. Butter shipped from Australia to Canada if entered at Vancouver is charged a duty of 1 cent per pound, but if trans-shipped from an American port 4 cents per pound, or a difference of $60 a ton in the imposed duty. There are other instances to which reference might be made. Trade from South America and from the East which formerly moved into Canada through American ports has been most adversely affected by this discrimination.

The Pacific coast is equally interested with Atlantic ports in this problem. I have already referred to shipments of butter from Australia. I note that importations of silk into this country through Canadian ports and by Canadian railroads have shown a marked increase. Probably over a third of the silk imported so enters this country. Why does this American trade come to us through Canada instead of through our own Pacific-coast ports? In the last analysis it is because it can be done upon precisely the same terms in the one case as in the other.

But I ask why should we suffer the loss of this traffic to our facilities through this equality of importing opportunity while Canada adopts a policy which denies such equality of treatment to goods entering Canada by an American port and an American railroad? The principle involved is what I chiefly complain of. I can see no reason why we should continue to permit imports to enter the United States through Canada without tariff surcharge while the Canadian practice is the reverse. The question presented by the amendment now before the Senate is whether the American rule shall be longer followed in the absence of a reciprocal policy on the part of Canada. No justification for it can be found.

The amendment proposes to impose a tariff surcharge of 10 percent upon imports entering the United States through Canada, subject to suspension by the President of such surcharge when it appears that Canada imposes the same duties upon imports passing through the United States into her territory as are imposed if the goods arrive directly at its own ports.

If we are to have reciprocity, the amendment definitely assures it at least in this one particular. We should secure this certain gain by the adoption of the amendment I have submitted. Its adoption by the Senate would evidence a decent regard for American rights and for American interests.

Mr. President, I very much hope the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] will accept the amendment, take it to conference, and, if he has not already given the subject matter the study which it desires, that he will there give the matter his further attention.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the object of the Senator from Maine; but if we can pass this bill, the matter referred to by the Senator is one of the things about which we may negotiate arrangements with Canada—namely, the elimination of this duty. Therefore, I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

(b) No agreement under the provisions of this act shall be concluded with any foreign country with respect to articles in the production of which labor standards, as reflected in wages, living scales, and labor costs, are lower than those which obtain in the production of the comparable articles in the United States.

(c) The United States Tariff Commission shall determine in each instance whether the specified conditions have been met.

On page 3, line 17, strike out "(b)" and insert "(e)."

On page 2, line 9, after the word "whenever" insert "after investigation by the Tariff Commission and conferences by said Commission with parties in interest."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, this amendment provides that no agreement under the provisions of the act shall be concluded with any foreign country with respect to articles in the production of which labor standards, as reflected in wages, living scales, and labor costs are lower than those which obtain in the production of the comparable articles in the United States.

I do not care for a record vote, but I ask to have the question put on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I send to the desk another amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. No foreign-trade agreement shall be entered into under the provisions of this act with respect to laces or braids, made on a braiding machine, classified under paragraph 1529 (a) of the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the workers in this industry now have only about 2 days' work a week; and I cannot quite understand why we should in any way share this work with workers in a foreign land.

Shoe laces, and braid made on a braiding machine suitable for use as shoe laces, constitute a very important industry in the United States, and give employment to a large number of people.

I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I have an amendment similar to the one proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, though I wish to discuss the amendment now before the Senate.

The braid industry is domiciled in large part in the State of Rhode Island. Normally it employs about 3,000 people, of whom one-half are citizens of my State. It operates under the minimum-wage schedules, hours of labor, and productive machines of the cotton-textile code adopted in March 1934.

Up to 1933 there was a very considerable foreign market for braids manufactured in this country; but subsequent thereto the Japanese products began to come into the United States, reaching a volume of 11,000 gross laces per month during January and February 1934.

From a statement which has been furnished me by those engaged in the industry, I find that importations of Japanese laces have increased from 420 gross laces in July 1933 to an average of 11,000 gross laces a month during January and February 1934. This statement goes on to say that the average value of a gross of Japanese laces is 0.64 yen, or about 20 cents at the prevailing rates of exchange.

The industry has a protective duty of 90 percent, and that makes the landing cost to the importer approximately 40 cents a gross. Several wholesalers in New York City are now offering Japanese laces at 45 cents a gross, but the domestic cost is now between 60 and 65 cents a gross. The industry applied for relief under section 3 (e) of the N.R.A. but has withdrawn its application.

I submit that unless we are prepared to afford that degree of protection to this industry—not large, it is true, and yet very considerable in the part of the country where it functions—there is no assurance that it can continue. The fact is, as I understand, that most of the factories now are operating on a schedule of about 2 days a week. The wages have been maintained at a high level, and the manufacturers desire to continue that treatment afforded to their operatives; but manifestly they cannot do so and compete with importations from Japan, where the scale of wages is all out of proportion to that which obtains in the United States.

I submit the amendment for the consideration of the Senate, and I urge upon Senators its importance to the industry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which has been offered by my colleague [Mr. REED], and ask that it be read and a vote taken upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, following line 22, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That no earthenware, crockeryware, china, porcelain, or any of the ware, and manufactures thereof, referred to and described in paragraphs 211 and 212 of the Tariff Act of 1930, shall be permitted to be imported into the United States and its possessions, in excess of 30,000 dozens, or 360,000 pieces from any country during any calendar month. The Secretary of the Treasury shall issue the necessary regulations to the collectors of the ports accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] on behalf of his colleague [Mr. REED].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a revision of two or three amendments that were printed at the request of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 11, after the word "duties", it is proposed to strike out "or other import restrictions."

On page 2, lines 20 and 21, it is proposed to strike out "and other import restrictions or such additional import restrictions."

On page 3, line 4, it is proposed to strike out "and other import restrictions."

On page 4, it is proposed to strike out paragraph (c), lines 7 to 12, inclusive.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I will say to the chairman of the committee that the purpose of this amendment is to strike from the bill all authority with respect to import restrictions. The Senate will recall that that subject has been discussed a great deal, especially on this side of the Chamber, particularly by the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] as well as by myself.

I do not think it is worth while to argue the matter further, because the discussion is all in the RECORD. I presume the chairman of the committee is not willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that I could not accept the amendment. We gave a great deal of consideration to it. Those who conceived the bill gave consideration to it; and I think it would weaken the bill very much if such an amendment should be adopted.

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall not argue the matter, and do not care to have a roll call on the amendment. I merely ask that the question be put on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert in the bill, at the proper place, the following language:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall authorize the President to change the present form and method of valuation of imports for duty purposes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I called attention to the fact that I understood there was some doubt as to whether it was intended to give to the President, under this bill, authority to change the present method of valuation. That is, I contended some days ago that in the present form of the bill the word "form" meant to give to the President certain authority with respect to the method of valuation, whether it should be the foreign valuation or the American valuation. This amendment is proposed for the purpose of making certain that there shall be no change in the present method of arriving at valuation. I think it is very important.

As I said to the Senate when I was discussing the bill as a whole, the chemical industry in particular has an American valuation. It is a very serious thing to create the uncertainty that will surely come from giving to the President the power to make agreements changing articles in that schedule and others from an American valuation to a foreign valuation.

I do not care to discuss the question further, but I hope that if my thought about it is correct, if that is what the bill provides, and that was not the intent of those who framed the bill, this amendment will be accepted and at least go to conference.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope there will be no conference on the bill. This would change one of the important powers we give to the President, namely, the matter of the change in valuation.

Mr. HASTINGS. And it was intended to give him that power?

Mr. HARRISON. It was intended to give him that power, not only to change the rates but classifications also. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk another amendment, to be known as "section 5" of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add the following new section:

SEC. 5. In order to make effective sections 1 and 2, the President is hereby authorized and directed, before concluding any reciprocal or foreign-trade agreements under this act, to notify all nations with which the United States has commercial treaties or conventions that so much of such treaties as provides for equal tariff treatment or unconditional trade opportunity will terminate on the expiration of such periods as may be required for the giving of notice by the provisions of those treaties or conventions, and that hereafter agreements entered into by the United States with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof embodying reciprocal-tariff rates will be limited to the foreign governments or instrumentalities with whom such agreement was entered.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, my understanding is that we have unconditional promises with at least 30 countries, including such countries as Austria, Czeckoslovakia, Germany, Norway, Poland, Spain, Brazil, Chile, and China. As long as we must automatically extend to these countries any concession we make to any other country, we are in a bad bargaining position. In our bargain with Colombia we presumably get some concession for the promises we give, but this bargain has become a promise to Brazil for nothing. Every time we make an agreement with some one country, the benefits are extended to others for no return, and our bargaining power is weakened.

It has been suggested that our bargains be limited to the products which are supplied chiefly by the country with which the bargain is made, but this policy has not been observed in the case of Colombia. We have also shown in the RECORD that this policy is not observed in the list of countries and commodities that have been selected and offered by the administration to accord with this principle.

If we are going to approve this bill, I urge the Senate to put our Government in the position of being able at least to bargain on a more equal footing than would be possible if we are going to have to continue to extend favors granted one country for a concession to another 29 countries without concession.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was rejected.

RECIPROCAL-TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I should like to offer a clarification amendment, and I offer it at the suggestion of those who have directed this legislation. The amendment is to come on page 4, line 20, after the word "act", where I propose to insert a comma and the following language: "or to any provision of any such agreement."

The purpose of the amendment is as follows: In 1922 we gave the privilege to producers in this country, or other parties interested, of taking certain appeals when there was an importation of goods into this country, whether it was with reference to valuation, or classification, or the amount of tariff duties imposed. That was broadened greatly, as those who were here in 1930 will recall, so that any producer could interpose a protest when goods were brought into this country, and would have the right of appeal to the courts, which might interfere with importations and might delay a matter indefinitely. The object of this amendment is merely to remove those restrictions which are in the present law from the operation of the proposed trade agreements.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, as I listen to the explanation made by the Senator, I assume that the privilege which the law now extends to American producers to interpose objections to changes made in the tariff act in pursuance of the provisions of the law now in force will be removed entirely?

Mr. HARRISON. So far as the proposed trade agreements are concerned, the object is not to permit any person to come in and destroy the effect of a trade agreement by interposing some objection when goods come in from some country with which we have such an agreement, whether it is directed against a classification, or valuation, or what not, and taking an appeal and tying the matter up in the courts indefinitely. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. HEBERT. In other words, the protection afforded to American manufacturers under the tariff law of 1930, so far as articles subjected to the operations of this measure are concerned, is to be removed by the proposed amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. So far as the trade agreements are concerned. Otherwise they would have no effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have another amendment to propose, of which I desire to make some explanation. The Senate can do with reference to the amendment whatever it pleases. It is with reference to a clarification of excise duties.

It will be noted that, so far as tariff rates are concerned, the President has the power to increase or lower them by 50 percent; but as to excise taxes, they may be continued. It was the intention of those who framed the legislation, and of the House in passing the bill, that they would be frozen; in other words, they might not be modified.

There were adopted in 1923, I believe it was, what were termed "excise taxes", or were carried into the law as excise taxes, but some question has been raised as to whether or not they are excise taxes or import taxes. The four items concerned were lumber, coal, oil, and copper. So, to remove any doubt as to what the intention was, I have an amendment to offer which will clarify the matter; and if the amendment shall be adopted, it will freeze those four items. In other words, the duties cannot be increased and the duties cannot be lowered. It will be recalled that as to those four items the provision of law will expire in June of next year.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Does that leave open the changing of the excise tax on coconut oil?

Mr. HARRISON. No; the tax on coconut oil is not involved at all.

Mr. COUZENS. If those four items are excluded, what is the implications with respect to the others?

Mr. HARRISON. There was a processing tax on coconut oil, and that is not affected by the bill at all. Coconut oil is not affected by this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator what the four items are, the duties upon which are now to be frozen by this bill?

Mr. HARRISON. All excise taxes are frozen by this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the Senator to name certain items.

Mr. HARRISON. It was pointed out that some question was raised as to whether or not those four items which were carried in the 1932 act, namely, lumber, copper, coal, and oil, would be affected, and whether the duties on them could be raised or lowered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did the Senator name lumber, coal, and oil?

Mr. HARRISON. Coal, oil, lumber, and copper. Those four are carried in the law as bearing excise taxes, and some question has been raised as to whether or not they are in fact excise taxes. In order to remove any doubt and to clarify the matter, I have offered this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it the understanding that if this amendment is agreed to, then the excise taxes upon these four articles in particular cannot be interfered with in any way whatever?

Mr. HARRISON. They cannot be increased and they cannot be lowered.

Mr. BORAH. Just why does the Senator single out those four items?

Mr. HARRISON. The reason is that all exices taxes are frozen in this bill. We do not propose to disturb excise taxes at all. The President is given the power with reference to import duties, and it was because the impression prevailed that on these items there were excise taxes that I offered the amendment. They are carried in the law as being subject to excise taxes.

As a matter of fact, there is very grave doubt as to whether they are or not. In my opinion, they are not excise taxes, but I do not wish to mislead anyone in the Senate about the matter at all, and I stated that they were excise taxes. That is the reason why I have offered this amendment.

The Senator will recall, of course, that I did not favor the tax on any one of those four items. I was one of those who signed the minority report, and one of those who opposed the taxes, and voted against every one of them. They expire in June 1935.

Mr. HASTINGS and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I reached the definite conclusion that the language in this definition of "exactions other than duties" had specific reference to excise taxes; not to these four items in particular.

Mr. HARRISON. It did not. It referred to excise taxes; but a great many thought these four items were excise taxes. They are carried in the law as excise taxes. Upon looking into them, I find that they are subject to two constructions. My judgment is that they should not be held to be excise taxes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I read into the RECORD a great many things that were taxed, such as playing cards, yachts, and what not. There is a special tax on them. What I desire to know is whether or not the language used in this definition was intended to give the President power over those particular taxes.

Mr. HARRISON. The kind of taxes styled "excise taxes" were not to be affected. They were not to be increased or lowered. They were frozen, in other words.

Mr. HASTINGS. The bill does not so provide.

Mr. HARRISON. The language of the bill on page 2 is:

To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements,—

And so forth.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have taken no time on the bill; and we are to vote, I believe, in 10 minutes. Will not the Senator from Mississippi withdraw this amendment? I do not want to be required to speak against the amendment, but there are a dozen Members on this side of the Chamber who ought to do so, and we have only 10 minutes.

Will the Senator now at the last hour draw a dirk? Will the Senator please withdraw his amendment? Is the Senator proposing to go to the country with a bill which will preclude the President from raising the tariffs on oil, copper, and lumber?

I oppose that amendment. No man who pretends to be fair would, after discussion upon this bill has been practically completed, draw from his breast a dirk against these great industries.

I have always been in favor of a proposal to give the President the power to raise tarffs and lower them, to get away from logrolling; and it ill becomes the able Senator at this hour, when no one can make a reply to him, to propose such an amendment. It is conceived in iniquity, it is born in sin, and generated in unfairness.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there are only a few minutes remaining before the time for voting. I desire to say to the Senator from Arizona that I have offered this amendment in order to help his contention. I shall gladly withdraw the proposal.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator will pardon me. I have only 3 minutes on this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator desires to have the amendment withdrawn, I shall be delighted to withdraw it.

Mr. ASHURST. I desire to have any amendment withdrawn which precludes the President from raising the tariff on copper.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Will not the Senator from Delaware permit me to send an amendment to the desk? I desire to send to the desk the amendment which the Senator from Mississippi withdrew, because we were given to understand that the amendment would be offered.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was trying to do the same thing.

Mr. LONG. Let me send it to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Louisiana to offer an amendment?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 12, after the word "imports", it is proposed to insert a semicolon and the following:

except that the term does not include excise taxes imposed under the provisions of paragraphs (4), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (c) of section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am willing to have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment. I desire to be heard for a minute.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I am willing to take my chances. I am willing to leave it to Franklin D. Roosevelt as to whether or not the tariff shall be increased.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I refuse to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana declines to yield.

Mr. LONG. I have but 5 minutes, and the Senator from Arizona has already spoken for 5 minutes.

Mr. President, we were given to understand and we were assured that copper, oil, coal, and lumber would not be affected by this bill; and, as one of the Senators who had received this assurance——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. No; I will not yield, Mr. President. I have only 5 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to know what effect the assurance the Senator received had on him. He apparently is not going to vote for the bill, anyway.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not know what effect it had, except that I took them at their word.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that I withdrew the amendment.

Mr. LONG. I am not censuring the Senator from Mississippi. I am offering his amendment, which I presume he will support. I believe he will.

Mr. President, we were told that these commodities would be protected because the tariffs we have on oil and lumber and coal and copper are very necessary. A number of Senators and I fought here many nights and many days to get tariffs on these items, and we want to protect them. We were assured that they would be protected. Today, as an example, notwithstanding the fact that it is said we have an overproduction of oil in America, none the less we are importing into the country 260,000 barrels of oil a day. Notwithstanding all our lumber trouble and the cheapness of lumber, lumber is still being imported. We were told, and we believed, and I am sure Senators mean to stick by it, that we should have this tariff protection, and it would be disastrous to us if it were not given to us.

I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). Repeating my statement made previously with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. NEELY's name was called). I am authorized to state that were the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and its transfer as on previous votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). I repeat my former announcement as to my pair and transfer and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], if present, would vote "yea" on this question. He is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], as announced by the transfer of the pair of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. OVERTON. I inquire if the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator is not recorded as having voted.

Mr. OVERTON. I am paired with that Senator and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 57, as follows:

So Mr. LONG's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is on the clerk's desk a committee amendment which was passed over at the request of some Senator, but just which Senator the Chair has forgotten. Without objection the clerk will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 5, strike out lines 19 and 20, as follows:

(c) The provisions of this act shall terminate 3 years from the date of its enactment.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) The authority of the President to enter into foreign-trade agreements under section 1 of this act shall terminate on the expiration of 3 years from the date of the enactment of this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill and ask to have it read, or, instead of having it read, I can explain it in a minute, if I may be permitted to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment in the nature of a substitute will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 336. Recommendations for adjustment of duties.—(a) Upon the request of the President of the United States, or upon its own motion, or upon application of any interested party showing good and sufficient reason therefor, the Commission shall investigate and ascertain the differences in the cost of production of any domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article. If the Commission finds it shown by the investigation that the duty imposed by law upon the foreign article does not equalize the differences in the cost of production, when efficiently and economically produced, of the domestic article and of the foreign article when produced in the principal competing country or countries, then the Commission shall report to the President and to the Congress its findings and its order with respect to such increases or decreases in the duty upon the foreign article as the Commission finds to be necessary in order to equalize such differences in the cost of production. Any such increased or decreased duty may include the transfer of the article from the dutiable list to the free list or from the free list to the dutiable list, a change in the form of duty, or a change in classification. The report shall be accompanied by a statement of the Commission setting forth the findings of the Commission with respect to the differences in cost of production, the elements of cost included in the cost of production of the respective articles as ascertained by the Commission, and any other matter deemed pertinent by the Commission. Sixty days after the date of the report to Congress of such order by said Commission, such changes in classification shall take effect, and such increased or decreased duties shall be levied, collected, and paid on such articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila): Provided, That if before the expiration of such period of 60 days the Congress then in session shall have by joint resolution declared said order of said Commission rejected, then the changes in classification, forms of rate, or increases or decreases in rates of duty specified in such order of said Commission shall not go into effect.

"The President, upon receipt of any such report of the Commission, shall promptly transmit the report to the Congress with his recommendations, if any, with respect to the increase or decrease in duty proposed by the Commission.

"Any bill having for its object the carrying out, in whole or in part, of the recommendations made by the Commission in any such report shall not include any item not included in such report; and in the consideration of such bill, either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate, no amendment thereto shall be considered which is not germane to the items included in such report.

"(b) No report shall be made by the Commission under this section unless the determination of the Commission with respect thereto is reached after an investigation by the Commission during the course of which the Commission shall have held hearings and given reasonable public notice of such hearings, and reasonable opportunity for the parties interested to be present, produce evidence, and to be heard. The Commission is authorized to adopt such reasonable rules of procedure as may be necessary to execute its functions under this section.

"(c) In ascertaining the differences in costs of production under this section, the Commission shall take into consideration, insofar as it finds it practicable—

"(1) The differences in conditions of production, including wages, costs of materials, and other items in cost of production of like or similar articles in the United States and in competing foreign countries;

"(2) Costs of transportation;

"(3) Other costs, including the cost of containers and coverings of whatever nature and other charges and expenses incident to placing the article in condition, packed ready for delivery, storage costs in the principal market or markets of the United States and of the principal competing country or countries, and costs of reconditioning or repacking wherever incurred;

"(4) Differences between the domestic and foreign article in packing and containers, and in condition in which received in the principal markets of the United States;

"(5) Differences in wholesale selling prices of domestic and foreign articles in the principal markets of the United States insofar as such prices are indicative of costs of production, provided such costs cannot be satisfactorily obtained;

"(6) Advantages granted to a foreign producer by a foreign government or by a person, partnership, corporation, or association in a foreign country;

"(7) Any other advantages or disadvantages in competition which increase or decrease in a definitely determinable amount the total cost at which domestic or foreign articles may be delivered in the principal market or markets of the United States; and

"(8) Definition of costs of transportation: Costs of transportation for the purposes of this section shall be held to include, insofar as applicable:

"(1) Freight charges and all other charges incident to transportation, including transit insurance, costs of loading and unloading, and port charges and landing charges. These costs shall be computed to such principal market or markets of the United States as may most nearly insure equal competitive opportunity to domestic articles and like or similar foreign articles in the principal consuming region or regions of the United States. If this purpose may be best accomplished thereby, such costs on domestic articles and on like or similar foreign articles shall be computed to different principal markets of the United States.

"(2) (A) In the case of an imported article, the cost of transporting such article from the areas of substantial production in the principal competing country to the principal port of importation of such article into the United States; and (B) in the case of a domestic article, the cost of transporting such article from the areas of substantial production that can reasonably be expected to ship the article thereto, to the principal port of importation into the United States of the like or similar competitive article."

SEC. 2. All uncompleted investigations instituted prior to the approval of this act under section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 prior to its amendment by this act, including investigations in which the President has not proclaimed changes in classification or in basis of value or increases or decreases in rates of duty, shall be dismissed without prejudice; but the information and evidence secured by the Commission in any such investigation may be given due consideration in any investigation instituted under the provisions of section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 as amended by this act.

SEC. 3. Consumers' counsel: (a) There shall be an office in the legislative branch of the Government to be known as the "Office of the Consumers' Counsel of the United States Tariff Commission."

The office shall be in charge of a counsel to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No person shall be eligible for appointment as counsel if such person has at any time acted in tariff matters before Congress or the United States Tariff Commission, either on his own behalf or as attorney, at law or in fact, or as legislative agent. The counsel shall be appointed for a term of 4 years and shall received a salary of $10,000 a year. The counsel shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as counsel.

(b) It shall be the duty of the counsel to appear in the interest of and represent the consuming public in any proceeding before the Commission. In any proceeding before the Commission in which the counsel has entered an appearance, the counsel shall have the right to offer any relevant testimony and argument, oral or written, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses and parties to the proceeding, and shall have the right to have subpena or other process of the Commission issue in his behalf. Whenever the counsel finds that it is in the interest of the consuming public to have the Commission furnish any information at its command or conduct any investigation as to differences in costs of production or other matters within its authority, then the counsel shall so certify to the Commission, specifying in the certificate the information or investigation desired. Thereupon the Commission shall promptly furnish to the counsel the information or promptly conduct the investigation and place the results thereof at the disposal of the counsel.

(c) Within the limitations of such appropriations as the Congress may from time to time provide, the counsel is authorized (subject to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended) to appoint and fix the salaries of assistants and clerks, and is authorized to make such expenditure as may be necessary for the performance of the duties vested in him.

SEC. 4. International Economic Conference: That the President is respectfully requested to initiate a movement for an international economic conference, with a view to (a) lowering excessive tariff duties and eliminating discriminatory and unfair trade practices, and other economic barriers affecting international trade, (b) preventing retaliatory tariff measures and economic wars, and (c) promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations between nations; but with the understanding that any agreement, treaty, or arrangement which changes any tariff then in existence, or in any way effects the revenue of the United States, must first be approved by the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] in the nature of a substitute for the bill as amended.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not want to infringe the agreement——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no debate permissible under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Can the Chair state that this is the old Democratic proposal?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no statement to make because he does not know anything about it.

Mr. LONG. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] in the nature of a substitute for the bill as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the Senate adopted the perfecting amendment, so called, offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in line 20, page 4, may be reconsidered for the purpose of having a roll call upon it.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the vote by which a certain amendment was agreed to. Is there objection?

Mr. COUZENS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, under the unanimous consent agreement, at the hour of 5 o'clock we were to take a vote on all amendments, and later on the bill upon its final passage. I submit a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any amendment on the desk that has not been submitted to a vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Amendments have to be offered from the floor.

Mr. McNARY. I think the Chair should state that before placing the bill upon its final passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the bill is still open to amendment. Does any Senator desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I have an amendment lying on the table, which I offer, and should like to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add the following new section at the end of the bill:

SEC. —. The provisions of this act shall not be used in a manner which will withdraw protection from American workers against those countries which employ cheap labor or who operate under a standard of living which is lower than that prevailing in this country. To this end the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor shall be required to ascertain differences in the wages of labor, and whenever the wages in the foreign country are 20 percent or more below the domestic wage no agreement may be consummated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. METCALF. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], which I transfer to the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). Repeating my former announcement of my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce a special pair on this question between the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON].

I beg also to reannounce the absence of certain Senators previously announced by me; and the reasons given I reannounce.

I also announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] authorizes it to be said that were he present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, to save time, I shall make no objection to taking another vote on that amendment, if that is what the Senator desires.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is all I desire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] on page 4, line 20? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEBERT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

So Mr. HARRISON's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have an amendment on the table providing that the President shall give at least 10 days' public notice of his intention to negotiate a treaty. I understand that an amendment has been agreed to providing for reasonable public notice; and, that being broader than my amendment, I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I submitted an amendment proposing to give the President authority over the free list under the treaty with Cuba. I understand negotiations are now in progress looking to a new treaty, and I do not wish to complicate matters; so I withdraw the amendment I have offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida withdraws his amendment. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. McNARY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. NEELY's name was called). I am authorized to state that were the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] present and voting he would vote "yea" on the passage of the bill.

MONETARY USE AND PURCHASE OF SILVER

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 9745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] if he will permit the Senate to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily, so that we may take up the conference report on the air mail bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Last week I served notice that when the unfinished business should have been disposed of I should enter a motion to discharge the Committee on Finance from the further consideration of House bill No. 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That matter is not before the Senate at the present time. The unfinished business is what is known as the "silver bill." The Chair understands that the Senator from Nevada is now asking unanimous consent to lay that bill aside temporarily for the purpose of considering the conference report which the Senator from Tennessee has in charge.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I feel somewhat disinclined to accede to that request. It is half past 5. We have had a very tiresome and trying day. I should have no objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada if it were that that should be done tomorrow upon the assembling of the Senate at 12 o'clock; but there will be some debate on the subject. As I said, we have had a very tiresome and trying day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] informs me that he will have to be absent from the city tomorrow, and that he desires to speak at least 10 minutes on the bill this afternoon. I asked the Senator from Nevada if he would agree to my request for no other reason than to let the Senator from Vermont finish his speech tonight.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Vermont, I am advised, is prepared to proceed but would rather do so tomorrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would the Senator be willing to recess until 11 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. McNARY. I see no need for that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator understands that I have a right to submit the conference report.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been delayed time and time and time again, and I hope that the Senate may dispose of it this afternoon.

Mr. McNARY. I am fully advised as to the right of the Senator. On account of the feeling that I have and that many of us have, who are tired, I am expressing the hope that we may recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow, at which time I shall not object to the request of the Senator from Nevada.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would the Senator from Oregon object, then, to a unanimous-consent agreement that tomorrow at 12 o'clock the Senate shall take up the conference report on the air mail bill?

Mr. McNARY. I twice stated specifically that I should not object.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, I will amend my request.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, one moment. The unfinished business before the Senate is the silver bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be before the Senate tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon, if a recess be taken until that time; but the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has a right to call up his report at any time he desires.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have on two occasions expressed the same view.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not necessary to ask unanimous consent unless the Senator desires to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed with the consideration of the conference report on the air mail bill tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon, and that at that time the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I amend that request? I ask unanimous consent that when we recess tonight the pending bill shall be the unfinished business; that we shall take it up at 12 o'clock tomorrow on reconvening, and that then it shall be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up the conference report on the air mail bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That means the same thing. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent? The Chair hears none.

SULTZBACH CLOTHING CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1191) for the relief of the Sultzbach Clothing Co., which were on page 1, line 6, after "$6,000", to insert in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States", and on page 1, line 11, after "provisions", to insert:

Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LUECO R. GOOCH

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

EMMA FERGUSON STARRETT

pay a gratuity to Emma Ferguson Starrett, which was, on page 1, line 8, after "husband", to insert:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MICHAEL BELLO

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1516) for the relief of Michael Bello, which was, on page 2, line 6, after "City", to insert:

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to recognize the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who has given notice that he desires to speak for about 3 minutes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to propound a question to the Senator from Mississippi. Will the Senator give us information as to when he proposed action on House bill 1? Is there a possibility of a report from the committee?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Minnesota appreciates the fact that the Senate has been engaged in debate and action on the tariff bill for a considerable period of time. The Finance Committee tried to have a meeting on Friday morning to transact business, and we hope to have a meeting tomorrow morning. The committee at its last meeting took a recess until tomorrow morning. I have just been advised that there is to be a conference at the White House on the part of the Senators from the drought-stricken section of the country, and I have asked that the committee meeting not be held until tomorrow afternoon at 2:30. I think at that time the committee ought to give some consideration to the bill referred to. I do not know what action the committee will take.

That is the situation at the present time.

RETIREMENT SYSTEM FOR RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, Senate bill 3231, now on the calendar, provides a retirement plan for the aged employees of the railroads. This plan has been approved by the outstanding representatives of the railway brotherhoods and some of the leading carriers. Under this bill all carriers coming within the scope of the Railway Labor Act are to be treated as one employer for the purposes of the act. The old-age pension or annuity is to be based upon the wages and the length of service of employees upon all railroads, with specified maximum limits.

The payments are to be provided through funds created by joint contributions from the railroad and the employees. The Treasury of the United States is made the depository for these funds. The payments to be made from such funds are limited to the amounts provided by the railroads and the employees, and no burden is placed on the Public Treasury.

Under the terms of the bill the employees shall contribute 2 percent of the compensation paid to them by the carrier and the carrier shall contribute an amount equal to twice the amount contributed by its employees. The administration of the system is to be under the direction and supervision of a board composed of three members, to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The bill carries definite provisions concerning rates of payment and age of retirement. It is estimated that the average wage of $1,667 per year will produce an average monthly annuity of $83.33.

There is considerable evidence to show that the payment of pensions to aged employees reduces the operating costs of the carriers. Without a satisfactory retirement system these aged employees are often continued in the service when it would be in the interest of economical operation to retire and pay them pensions.

Good business judgment dictates the policy of replacing worn-out and depreciated equipment with that which is new and efficient. It is equally good business to retire those employees who have worn themselves out through long years of arduous toil in the performance of faithful service to industry. A reasonable old-age-retirement plan is as helpful to industry as it is beneficent to labor.

I believe this is a step in the right direction because it aims to make a humane settlement of a very important human problem. I favor this measure not alone for what it will mean ultimately to railway employees, but also for what it foretells of an adequate industrial plan for aged workmen in every line of employment. One of the chief social problems which confronts the American people today is to provide a system of employment which will enable the workman to take care of himself from youth to the end of his days. The pending legislation does not provide for all of these needs; it does not provide unemployment insurance; but it is a step in the right direction. If this plan is put into successful operation after the 4-year experience period provided in the bill, it will furnish incentive for other legislation of a kindred nature.

As a matter of principle I think that it is fair that industrial management and workers should combine to provide retirement funds for the aged. The amounts and percentages provided in the bill are none too large to meet the practical needs of the American workman who has reached the age of 65 years and is ready for retirement. If we do not supply a pension system to our workers, we must continue to struggle on with the heavy burdens of taxation imposed on us for the support of poorhouses which are a blight upon our civilization, and for homes for the aged which ordinarily do not satisfy the needs of the individual as well as the modest home which the workman may claim for himself.

Whether the needs of the aged are met through a pension system or through the stigma of the poorhouse, they must be met. Common sense and decency suggest old-age-pension plans. In view of the approval which has been placed on Senate bill 3231 by prominent railway labor groups and railway executives and in view of the reasonable nature of the plans outlined in the bill which accords with the trends of the time and looks to the needs of the future, I favor its passage.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair.) Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator has been discussing the Hatfield-Wagner railroad retirement bill?

Mr. DAVIS. That is correct.

Mr. HATFIELD. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] respecting the Hatfield-Wagner railroad retirement bill which the Senator from Pennsylvania is discussing, and, to inquire whether we may not at some time in the immediate future take up the bill and dispose of it? In my judgment it will not take long to act favorably on it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am unable to give the Senator from West Virginia assurance regarding the matter, but I am hopeful that the bill may be taken up before the end of the session.

Mr. HATFIELD. I understand there is a very favorable attitude toward the bill in the House and that if we can secure prompt and favorable consideration of this measure in the Senate, the House will also act favorably on it, thus giving every assurance that the measure will become a law at this session.

MONETARY USE AND PURCHASE OF SILVER

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, today's Washington Post carries an interview with the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] under the title "Monetary Reform Held World's Need by Borah."

The interview covers such subjects as unemployment, world trade, disarmament, international discords, and in the interview the distinguished Senator holds that all other questions, domestic, national, and international, are secondary to a revision, adjustment, and standardization of monetary systems.

In the interview it is suggested that world monetary systems have been wrecked; that the world supply of gold is too limited to serve as either money or the base for sufficient money to serve the world demand for money. If it is true that we must have a metallic base to support our paper and deposit money, and if it be true that gold is too limited to form such base, then the only other satisfactory metal with which gold may be reinforced is silver. Silver has served the masses of the peoples of the world as money since the dawn of history. Silver was the money of the American colonists. The Continental Congress, by resolution, adopted the silver dollar as the unit of value.

Alexander Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury, in his report on the establishment of a mint, recommended that the silver dollar be continued as the standard unit of value. The American Congress accepted the recommendations of Secretary Hamilton and made by law the silver dollar of 371¼ grains of pure silver the American standard unit of value.

The record shows that since the discovery of America silver has been recognized as the money of the masses. Today silver is the money of the masses of three-fourths of the peoples of the world.

If the 125 millions of the people of the States are to enjoy benefits and profits from trade with over one billion of the people of other nations, then it is obvious that we should so adjust our monetary system as to permit of the freest trade with such silver-using nations and peoples.

Mr. President, because of the importance of the subject discussed and because I endorse the suggestions made and the opinions expressed in the interview, I ask that it be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Monday, June 4, 1934]

MONETARY REFORM HELD WORLD'S NEED BY BORAH—SENATOR SEES NO HOPE OF CURING ILLS UNTIL REVISION

By Franklyn Waltman, Jr.

International action to readjust the monetary systems of the world, in order to give people a greater purchasing power, is the basic solution underlying the major problems harassing all nations, Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH, Republican, of Idaho, yesterday told the Post.

In Senator BORAH's opinion the world's statesmen may grapple at home with the problem of giving employment to tens of millions of idle workers; they may devise schemes to revive foreign trade, and they may meetin solemn conclaves in efforts to bring about disarmament and solve the Japanese question, but all their efforts will come to naught, or at best have only a temporary effect, until they revise the world's monetary systems.

The leonine-headed Idahoan, who has been in the Senate 27 years—longer than any other member of that body—in pointing his finger to defective monetary systems as the root of present world troubles, did not undertake to prescribe a remedy. But he made clear his skepticism of the efficacy of the gold standard and threw out the suggestion that silver might be given a more important part to play as money and medium of exchange.

BORAH is an ardent member of the Senate's silver bloc and recently has urged that this country give to the white metal a more important place in its monetary system. He long has believed that international action in regard to silver is preferable to going it alone. But since the break-down of the London Economic and Monetary Conference, BORAH has despaired that other governments will cooperate with the United States.

A year ago BORAH bolted the silver bloc and voted against a silver-purchase measure because he thought President Roosevelt should be left with a free hand to deal with the silver problem at the London conference. The pending silver bill leaves the President a free hand to act as he deems wise and it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that Mr. Roosevelt may make overtures to the major world powers to cooperate with him, in laying the foundation for the establishment of a bimetallic monetary system as soon as this legislation is approved.

ASKED ABOUT WORLD DRIFT

Senator BORAH made his observations in response to a question from the Post as to "where is the world drifting?" This question was propounded to the Idaho Senator because for years he has been a close student and observer of international and world-wide affairs, because he is a former chairman of the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee, and because BORAH, sometimes called the Senate's "lone wolf", is an independent and courageous critic of current trends.

Responding to the question, BORAH asserted that "it has a tinge of despair in it", adding that "whatever else we may lose, we must not lose our courage, our faith in the people, and in our institutions—if we do, our troubles have been as nothing compared to what they will be."

"At the base of all our troubles is the poverty and misery of the masses", BORAH continued. "Eighty percent of the world's population is said to be living below the poverty line. There is no remedy for all our ills and there is no single panacea. But one thing constantly haunts one when you think of the world's present conditions, and that is that we have an abundance of everything necessary to clothe and feed and make happy the human family, and yet 80 percent of it is in misery.

GOLD STANDARD DISCUSSED

"It will be recalled a message of congratulation and assurance went out to all the world early in 1929. It was a message from the great in finance and business. What was the cause of the glad tidings? The gold standard had been adopted by every leading nation on the globe except China, and China was being labored with to come within the golden circle.

"The gold standard was all but universal; therefore, confidence was to prevail, business to go forward, employment to be universal. It had been a hard struggle after the war to get back into gold. But the struggle had to be made if the world was to recover. What we wanted was the gold standard. We had it. Now, let's go!

"But something went wrong. Business began to get uneasy. A tremor, like that in a building when the foundation is giving away, was felt in the business world. Prices of farm products, which had been falling for some time, continued to fall. Other prices soon followed. Many nations on the gold standard looked about for their gold and they did not have any. It had all gone to England and France and the United States. Liquidation set in. Unemployment increased with startling rapidity. Confidence disappeared, and gold went into hiding. According to all theories, all professors, and all economists, this ought not to have happened; indeed, it could not happen, but it did.

MORE INCOME NEEDED

"There are some who believe that the monetary systems of the world, which have been built up since about 1816, have been wrecked. That they are no longer sufficient and efficient with which to do the business of the world; that the reason why 80 percent of the world is below the poverty line while the whole word is rich in the things which they need, is because there is something wrong with our monetary system.

"We have the disarmament problem, the Japanese problem, so it is said, the unemployment problem, the nondistribution problem, and a multitude of problems, all of which centers in the one problem of how to distribute among the people of the world that which the world so abundantly possesses, and how can you do that under our monetary system? Some are disturbed about a flood of silver. It will take a flood of the precious metals to furnish an adequate volume of sound money with which to do the business of the world.

THREE NATIONS CORNER GOLD

"We are interested in and are discussing the question of building up foreign trade. Our attention is called to the fact that foreign trade has reached the vanishing point. But the decrease of domestic trade is almost as startling as that of foreign trade.

"Now, we are not going to rebuild foreign trade or domestic trade to any extent until the people are able to buy; until they have something with which to buy. Trade diminishes as hunger spreads and increases. The rebuilding of trade, domestic and foreign, depends upon rebuilding purchasing power. We loaned vast sums of money to Europe and for a time foreign trade got the benefit of it. So, now, if some providential hand should scatter millions among the Europeans our foreign trade would respond.

"But under the world's present monetary system we need not expect the rebuilding of foreign trade to any marked extent. Three nations hold practically all the gold of the world, and those three nations are facing bankruptcy because they have the gold and have the goods. They will not let loose of the former and they cannot get rid of the latter. And these three nations stand at the head of the list of those nations which have undertaken to destroy the money of the balance of the world and stand at the head of the list in the endeavor to prevent its restoration."

IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF WATER RESOURCES

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

On February 2, 1934, by resolution, the Congress requested me to report on "a comprehensive plan for the improvement and development of the Rivers of the United States, with a view of giving the Congress information for the guidance of legislation which will provide for the maximum amount of flood control, navigation, irrigation, and development of hydroelectric power."

Pursuant thereto I requested the Secretaries of the Departments of the Interior, War, Agriculture, and Labor to advise on the development of a water policy and on the choice of projects. I am sending herewith copies of their report, together with separate letters from the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Labor, and also:

(1) List of technical advisory committees of the President's committee.

(2) Review of reports of technical subcommittees on water flow.

(3) Review of report of technical subcommittees covering additions in the arid section, prepared by the Bureau of Reclamation.

(4) Seven reports of technical subcommittees covering various regions.

I ask that the Congress bear in mind certain obvious facts relating to these reports:

(1) That the time for the preparation of these reports was extremely limited.

(2) That the subject is one of enormous magnitude, covering the whole of the United States.

(3) That the resolution of the Congress covering the subjects of flood control, navigation, irrigation, and development of hydroelectric power automatically opened the door to all interrelated subjects which come under the general head of land and water use. This broader definition brings to our attention very clearly such kindred problems as soil erosion, stream polution, fire prevention, reforestation, afforestation, marginal lands, stranded communities, distribution of industries, education, highway building, home building, and a dozen others.

(4) All of the reports were based primarily on information already at hand and further study is strongly recommended.

(5) For the purpose of making a preliminary test, I requested a wholly tentative trial selection of 10 specific projects. As I had expected, the report strongly doubts the advisability of recommending these projects, on the ground that any selection at this point must necessarily omit many meritorious projects which further analysis may show to be preferable.

(6) The reports of the technical subcommittees, covering various areas, are of definite value. But before any work is done, it is obvious that a competent coordinating body must go over all of these reports, as well as reports on other projects and produce a comprehensive plan.

In view of the above, I therefore suggest that the Congress regard this message and the accompanying documents as merely a preliminary study and allow me, between now and the assembling of the next Congress, to complete these studies and to outline to the next Congress a comprehensive plan to be pursued over a long period of years. Further legislative action on this subject at this session of the Congress seems to me, therefore, unnecessary.

I expect before the final adjournment of this Congress to forward to it a broader outline of national policy in which the subject matter of this message will be presented in conjunction with two other subjects also relating to human welfare and security.

We should proceed toward a rounded policy of national scope.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

SOVIET RUSSIA

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an interesting and instructive article headed "On Understanding Soviet Russia", by Corliss Lamont.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

ON UNDERSTANDING SOVIET RUSSIA

By Corliss Lamont

Since returning from a 2 months' trip to Soviet Russia I have had occasion to discuss with many different types of Americans the situation in that country. Accordingly I have had the opportunity to discover what seem to be the most common misunderstandings concerning the Soviet Union in the American mind. These misunderstandings I have tried to clear up in a positive manner by formulating five bases or standards of judgment which seem necessary to me for anyone who wishes adequately to comprehend what is going on in Russia today. In view of America's recent recognition of the Soviet Union and the increasingly close relations between the two nations, more and more Americans are feeling the need for some such intellectual measuring rod as I have in mind. The five standards of judgment, then, which I would suggest can be summarized as follows:

I

First of all, we should take into constant consideration Russia's geography, cultural background, and history.

The Soviet Union covers a vast and sprawling territory, representing between a sixth and a seventh of the entire world's surface. It is about the size of all of North America and three times as big as the United States. From the Arctic Ocean in the north to the Black Sea in the south, from the Baltic in the west to the Pacific in the east, the Red flag flies; and over a total population of almost 170,000,000. While these continental proportions entail certain advantages in the scope and variety of natural resources, they create a sheer problem of administration which is breathtaking and which in itself explains many of the troubles that the Soviet Government has encountered.

This problem of administration is made much more difficult by the fact that in this huge domain live about 150 different races, each with its own language, its own customs, and its own culture. The Czars oppressed the national minorities to an extreme degree, forcing upon them a policy of strict Russification and attempting to stamp out their native cultures. When the Bolsheviks came into power in the fall of 1917 about 80 percent of the population were peasants engaged in agricultural pursuits and using, for the most part, decidedly primitive methods. * * *

There can be little doubt that had it not been for the aid in men, munitions, and money which the Allies gave to the White counterrevolutionaries, the civil war in Russia would have come to an end in rather short order. As it was, it lasted in extreme form 3 terrible years, during which 2,000,000 people were killed, approximately $6,000,000,000 worth of property destroyed, and indirect losses suffered amounting to some $20,000,000,000 more. * * *

When one reflects upon this 5-year period of civil conflict, foreign invasion, and famine following hard upon three calamitous years of the Great War and two far-reaching revolutions, it seems something like a miracle that the Communists came through with their heads up and their colors flying. It was an epic triumph of sheer will power and intellect. And when on this background I paint the picture of the Soviets' progress during the last decade, I cannot help concluding that their achievement has been perhaps the greatest and most heroic in human history.

II

In the second place, in making comparisons between the Soviet Union and other countries, we must do so on a relative and not on an absolute basis.

It is common knowledge that in 1917 Russia was primarily an agricultural country with, generally speaking, one of the lowest standards of living in the world. In regard to industrial and technical development it was a century or so behind the more advanced nations of the west. It had hardly reached the point that England had attained in 1800. And, as we indicated in the first section, cultural backwardness was one of the chief characteristics of its predominantly peasant population. It is obviously absurd to expect that Russia could completely catch up in a short 15 years with countries like England, Germany, and the United States. It is unfair, then, to talk of the Soviet Union as if that expectation were a rational one and to condemn it because, in absolute terms, it does not yet measure up in certain fundamental ways to the most highly evolved industrial nations. The real question is, How much have conditions in Russia improved since the time of the czars?

Yet even this question cannot be asked without one important qualification; the new Russia is a good deal smaller in territory and population than the old Russia. It lost all of the western provinces at the end of the war: Finland, Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, and Bessarabia, this last rich region being seized by force of arms by Rumania. The total extent of these lands amounts to considerably more than the combined area of France and Germany; their total population today is about 44,000,000. In these regions, especially in the Polish coal and textile centers and in the Finnish pulp and paper centers, were many of the most highly developed industries of the Czar's empire. Their loss entailed a far-reaching reorientation of Russian economy. These districts were, on the whole, considerably more advanced in a western European sense than the rest of prerevolutionary Russia. Hence it will not do, without keeping this point continually in mind, to draw comparisons between these former parts of the Russian Empire and the present-day Soviet Union.

To give an example of what we mean by a relative comparison let us take the matter of shoes. In 1913 there were 20,000,000 pairs of shoes produced in Russia, which were distributed mainly in the cities and among the upper classes. The great majority of the peasants went barefoot in the summer and in the winter fashioned themselves straw footwear. Today, though more than 80,000,000 pairs of shoes are being manufactured annually, it is evident that the soviet masses are still in need of more and better footgear and that it will be some time before they overtake the people of the U.S.A. in this respect. But the important point to remember is that the Soviet Union is producing four times as many shoes as in pre-war days and is distributing them, moreover, to all sections of the population and not just to a privileged group of urban dwellers. Or take the matter of beggars. In the old Russia begging was one of the great professions, with a million persons devoted to its devious means and ends. In 1924 this startling number had been reduced to 140,000 and in 1933 to 50,000. This constitutes a really considerable achievement, despite the fact that tourists are still shocked by meeting beggars in all the cities of the Soviet Union.

If only relative comparisons are fair, then it is plainly irrelevant to judge the Soviet Union in terms of American cleanliness, conveniences, and mechanical gadgets. * * *

Yet it is remarkable to note that already, even on an absolute scale, the Soviet Union is superior to the United States (not to mention other capitalist lands) in a number of ways. For instance, there is no unemployment there; the theory and practice of central economic planning has made notable headway; legislation on behalf of women and children and workers has attained new and very high levels; the excellent system of public-health services constitutes a challenge to medical authorities everywhere else; prostitution has been practically eliminated; science is in the saddle in place of superstition throughout the land; an enthusiasm exists for education and the things of culture unknown elsewhere in the world; the attitude toward sex and marriage is frank and healthy; race prejudice has all but disappeared; the art and culture of national minorities is manifesting a veritable rennaissance; and a true international spirit holds sway. * * *

III

In the third place, we ought to bear carefully in mind the extra-economic and cultural achievements of the Soviet Union.

Publicity abroad about the Soviet Union has stressed the herculean economic accomplishments of the new regime. Yet there was a 5-year plan in art as well as in industry. And there is a tendency to forget that cultural progress has paralleled the material gains, and has been just as great. We have given passing mention above to some of the cultural gains. Without in any sense trying to cover the entire cultural enterprise, we shall take up a few outstanding examples of the forward march on this broad sector of Soviet activity.

Perhaps the most striking advance of all has taken place in educational affairs. Some of the statistics here are enlightening. Illiteracy is close to complete liquidation with the pre-war figure of more than 70 percent now reduced to less than 10 percent; the number of children in primary and secondary schools has increased from eight to twenty-six million; and the number of students in higher educational institutions has grown four times over. At the same time the masses of the people have become voracious readers. There are 2,000 magazines in the U.S.S.R., with an annual circulation of 391,000,000 copies; there are 1,600 newspapers in 83 different languages, 9 times the pre-war number, with a circulation 14 times as great. As to books and pamphlets, during 1932 more than 53,000 titles were published totaling 800,000,000 copies, four times the 1913 level in both regards. No wonder there is a constant paper shortage in the Soviet Union.

The spread of education has gone on, not just in the cities but throughout the agricultural regions as well. In fact, the awakening of millions and millions of formerly ignorant and illiterate peasants to the new cultural life is probably the most remarkable thing of all. * * *

IV

In the fourth place, it is necessary to grasp the significance of the various compromises and shifts in policy that occur in the Soviet Union from time to time.

The basic principle to keep in mind here is that no competent Marxist ever dreamed that it would be possible for socialism in any country to leap up full-fledged all at once from the chaos of the old order. Especially does this principle apply to a nation which was as far behind as Russia. There the building of socialism obviously entails a long, hard struggle both in setting up the necessary industro-mechanical foundations of the new society and in eradicating the habits and psychology of the former feudalist-capitalist state. In this struggle there are bound to be bad years as well as good, failures as well as triumphs, detours as well as marches straight ahead. And it is essential to distinguish temporary setbacks from permanent defeats.

Since the Soviet Union is the first nation in the history of the world to attempt the construction of a socialist order, it is inevitable that serious and unforeseen problems should arise. The Communist leaders have had practically no precedents on which to draw. They have made, on occasion, serious mistakes; but when they themselves have been at fault they have recognized the fact and have not resorted to the easy (though often just) excuse that the Czarist inheritance is to blame. Far from attempting to cover up their blunders, the Soviet officials and workers have set them forth in detail in the press throughout the land. Their frank self-criticism has become a veritable institution, and has been exceedingly effective in combating bureaucracy and inefficiency. At the same time, thanks to it, foreign detractors have obtained some of their most potent ammunition.

External as well as internal difficulties suddenly arise to confront the U.S.S.R. For instance, who could have predicted the eruption of the Japanese volcano in Manchuria 2 years ago? Yet nothing has done more to disrupt the carefully laid plans of the Soviet Union than the war-breeding Japanese adventure upon the mainland of Asia. In order to defend themselves from possible aggression in the Far East the Russians have had to strengthen the defensive forces in Siberia, to back these forces up with a big food reserve drawn from other and needy sections of the country, and to allocate to the manufacture of munitions and other army supplies materials that could be ill spared from normal productive operations. All of this happened during the last year of the first 5-year plan and did much to handicap its fulfillment.

Japan, however, is not the only enemy of the Soviet Union, and the Soviet Government has had to maintain a vigilant watch on the western as well as the eastern border. Indeed, the existence of the Soviet Union in a generally hostile world with even diplomatic recognition denied for 16 years by America, the strongest capitalist power, has constituted a problem which presumably the next socialist commonwealth will not have to face. Forced to import a large proportion of its machinery and industrial equipment from the outside world, Russia has suffered heavily from the hard credit terms and, in some cases, financial boycott imposed by foreign capitalists. * * *

Then other critics complain because the Soviet Government has not yet nationalized clothes and bicycles. They have the curious idea that true socialism precludes the owning of personal property. But in a socialist society, be it in the Soviet Union or anywhere else, there is no reason why an individual should not own a bicycle, an automobile, a clock, a library, a suit of clothes, or, indeed, six suits of clothes. One of the chief aims of socialism is that every citizen should have an abundance of personal possessions, including so-called "luxuries." The point is that personal wealth must be for consumption, for use, for enjoyment. It must not become capital. All property entailing production or distribution or the possible exploitation of workers is, under socialism, collective owned; intimate personal property is not and never will be.

V

In the fifth place, any proper evaluation of the Soviet Union must take the future into account.

The Soviet Union is certainly no utopia as yet; the point is that no sensible person could have expected it to be. Full socialism has not been attained in Russia and will not be attained for some while. The very good reasons for this we have already pointed out. At the same time, it can hardly be doubted that the direction of the Soviet Union from both the material and cultural standpoint is steadily and on the whole upward. The problems are those of growth, not decay. And the serious stresses and strains that still exist seem justified in the light of the great goal ahead. The soviet masses have been making what may be called "constructive" sacrifices, with a splendid purpose held consciously and continually in mind. In the rest of the world, too, millions and millions of people have been making sacrifices; but these sacrifices are chaotic, purposeless, and to a large extent useless. There is no plan behind them. They are not leading anywhere. What gains, for example, have resulted from the sufferings of the 40,000,000 unemployed in the capitalist world during 4 years of depression? And does it not seem probable that the sacrifices of these millions and their families—and of other millions and their families—will continue indefinitely under the present system?

The fundamental aim of the first 5-year plan was to lay a basis of heavy industry and collectivized, mechanized agriculture which would both provide the groundwork of socialism and make the U.S.S.R., in case of need, independent of the capitalist world. Accordingly, producers' goods were given the right-of-way over consumers' goods; and huge quantities of foodstuffs, which could easily have been used at home, were exported in face of declining depression prices to pay for the import of machinery and technicians. The fast pace of the 5-year plan was set in the first instance through fear of foreign aggression. The Soviet Union has not forgotten the capitalist intervention of the early twenties and proceeds on the theory that what has happened once may happen again.

While the revised and final schedules of the first 5-year plan were not 100 percent fulfilled in the 4¼ years allotted, the main objectives were achieved. And of course the original 1928 estimates, allowing for 5 full years, were greatly surpassed. Already, with the second 5-year plan well under way, there is a much greater emphasis on the output of consumers' goods. And the tempo of things has been considerably moderated. * * *

No estimate of the future of the Soviet Union would be complete without some mention of the probable development of governmental institutions and methods. In Marxist theory the dictatorship of the proletariat is a temporary phase for a transitional period; as the need for it gradually disappears the dictatorship itself disappears. The eventual aim is a more real and complete democracy than has ever been known in the world before. This constitutes one of the most important differences between a Fascist and Communist dictatorship. People have the habit of lumping the two together as if they were in essence the same, but with fascism the dictatorship has a very different purpose and apparently is to be eternal; there is no thought of or provision for an ultimate transition to democracy.

Of course, it is theoretically possible that those who hold the power in the Soviet Government will never willingly give it up. If so, the ruling group will be betraying a fundamental tenet of Marxism. But the signs certainly point in the opposite direction.

* * * * * * *

This finishes my account of the five standards of judgment which seem to me most pertinent in comprehending what is going on in Soviet Russia at the present time. In conclusion, I should like to make one suggestion which I believe to be appropriate. This is that we Americans should remember that in the first 16 years of the American Revolution the new Republic went through a very difficult period. In 1792, 16 years after the Declaration of Independence, the youthful United States was still experiencing grave troubles. The Constitution had been in effect only 3 years; the country was in a turbulent state, chaotic, disunited, and poor; European observers were predicting failure; and foreign powers loomed menacingly on the horizon. Paradoxically enough, the most reactionary of the Old World nations, Czarist Russia, refused to recognize the revolutionary American Government for 33 years after the break with England. It is well to recall that the Americans of our own revolutionary era, like the Russians of today, had a rather hard time of it for a while.

MONDAY, JUNE 4, 1934

The House met at 11 o'clock.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious Lord and only Savior, Thou who dost hear our sighs, count our tears and whose land is on the breaking heart, wilt hear us when we pray. We rejoice that love made the world; love is in the world and love will triumph in the end. We thank Thee that to this conclusion came at last the spiritual teacher of the old world when He said: Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him, for He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are dust. Heavenly Father, help us to grasp this eternal truth, and may we praise Thee that it is as stable as the rock of ages. Forgive us the sins we once cherished as we lift our hearts in prayer for the Father's compassion. Engage us to follow in the train of the Galilean whose teachings ever war against selfishness, injustice, and sin. In the Master's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

PROCUREMENT DIVISION, PUBLIC WORKS BRANCH

Public buildings: For emergency construction of public-building projects outside of the District of Columbia (including the acquisition, where necessary, by purchase, condemnation, exchange, or otherwise of sites and additional land for such buildings; the demolition of old buildings where necessary and the construction, remodeling, or extension of buildings; rental of temporary quarters during construction, including moving expenses; purchase of necessary equipment for buildings and such additional administrative expenses and salaries as may be required solely for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this paragraph), $65,000,000; such projects, including the sites therefor, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, acting jointly, from the public-building projects specified in statements nos. 2 and 3 incorporated in House Report No. 1879, Seventy-third Congress, pages 24 to 40, inclusive, and projects selected shall be carried out within the respective estimated or proposed limits of cost specified in such statements, except as such limits are authorized to be modified by the provisions of the next paragraph: Provided, That with a view to relieving country-wide unemployment the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, in the selection of towns or cities in which buildings are to be constructed, shall endeavor to distribute the projects equitably throughout the country so far as may be consistent with the needs of the public service; and the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General may also select for prosecution under this appropriation such projects not included in such report as in their judgment are economically sound and advantageous to the public service: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to direct the preparation of all sketches, estimates, plans, and specifications (including supervision and inspection thereof), and to enter into all contracts necessary for carrying out the purposes of this paragraph; and he is hereby authorized, when deemed by him desirable and advantageous, to employ, by contract or otherwise, temporary professional, technical, or nontechnical employees, firms, or corporations, to such extent as may be required to carry out the purposes of this paragraph, without reference to civil-service laws, rules, and regulations, or to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, or to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: Provided further, That in the acquisition of any land or sites for the purposes of Federal public buildings and in the construction of such buildings provided for in this paragraph the provisions of sections 305 and 306 of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended, shall apply.

In order to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts when the bid of the lowest responsible bidder received in response to public advertisement exceeds the amount available for any project selected under the preceding paragraph and/or for projects for which allotment has been heretofore, or may hereafter be, made to the Treasury Department for public buildings construction by the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works (which allotments shall remain available for the execution of the projects concerned unless released by the Secretary of the Treasury), there shall be made available by the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works an additional sum of $2,500,000 out of any unobligated funds under the control of such Administration, which total sum shall be transferred immediately upon the enactment of this act to the Treasury Department and, when approved by the President, may be used in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts for public buildings in an amount not exceeding, in any one case, 10 percent in excess of the amount available therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, 20 minutes is manifestly an insufficient time to discuss the details of this bill. I will only discuss the high spots, and those extraordinary appropriations that Congress is more interested in, and that the country is more interested in than the minor items of the bill.

First I shall discuss, for a few minutes, relief as administered by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. We appropriated under the act of May 7, 1933, $500,000,000. There was later allotted for relief—civil works—$400,000,000 from the Public Works Administration. Then on February 15 of this year we appropriated $950,000,000 for relief and civil works, making a grand total appropriated by the Federal Government for relief of $1,850,000,000. This has all been expended or will be expended up to the commencement of the next fiscal year, July 1, 1934, with the exception of $250,000,000.

The maximum amount that is provided under this bill and the maximum estimate by Mr. Hopkins of the appropriations for public relief is $640,000,000 additional money, making $890,000,000 for the administration of relief throughout the country for the 8 months commencing with July 1 next. Mr. Hopkins states that under the conditions which existed at the time the hearing was held this would be sufficient for him to do the job. Therefore we expect the maximum for direct relief and work relief will be $890,000,000 for the 8 months of the next fiscal year under this act. Mr. Hopkins told us that was sufficient. I include as part of my remarks a statement of relief funds.

Receipts:

Total		1,394,417,716
Balance May 1, 1934		455,582,284
Estimated expenditures to July 1, 1934		205,582,284

Drought relief (have expended about $25,000,000 largely for stock feed)	48,000,000

Proposed application from July 1, 1934, to Mar. 1, 1935 (8 months) of—Continued.

Schools (subject to authorization by the President)	48,000,000

Public roads is the next item that I shall touch on briefly. The funds available for the highway program for the fiscal years 1934 and 1935 obligated or allotted but the money not expended as of July 1, 1933, amount to $110,000,000. Unobligated July 1, 1933, $15,000,000. Allotted to the highway program by the National Recovery Act, $400,000,000. State contributions, $16,000,000, and carried in this bill for 1935, $100,000,000. This makes a grand total available for the 2 years for public-highway construction of $641,000,000.

Of that amount only $275,000,000 has been estimated to be expended in this fiscal year 1934, which will leave to be expended in the fiscal year 1935, the estimated sum of $300,000,000. In other words, the total estimate of the amount which can be expended for highway construction in the fiscal year 1935 is $300,000,000. After that has been expended there will be an estimated balance unexpended on June 30, 1935, of $66,000,000. This ought to satisfy the most ardent advocates of highway construction in the United States, because it is all the money that is available and which can be efficiently expended. I append a table showing this data.

Funds available for highway program, fiscal years 1934 and 1935:
Obligated or allocated as of July 1, 1933 (roundly)		$110,000,000
Unobligated, July 1, 1933		15,190,331
Section 204, National Industrial Recovery Act		400,000,000
State contributions to Section 204 program		16,162,865
This bill for 1935		100,000,000
Total		641,353,196
Estimated expenditures or Treasury withdrawals:
1934	$275,055,000
Unexpended balance (estimated) July 1, 1935		66,298,196

Provision is also included authorizing the appropriation of $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1936 and $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1937 for roads, and providing that the Secretary of Agriculture may approve projects and enter into definite contracts committing the United States for these amounts. These two authorized sums are to be apportioned under the provisions of the Highway Act of 1916, as amended, but in the case of the $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1936 only 50 percent is required to be matched by the States and in the case of the $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1937 all is required to be matched. In connection with these two authorized appropriations a paragraph is inserted providing that no deductions shall be made therefrom on account of prior advances and/or loans to the States for the construction of roads under the requirements of the Federal Highway Act. The paragraph has the effect of waiving the deduction of $16,000,000 for each of the years 1936 and 1937 required under the provisions of the act of December 20, 1930.

An appropriation of $6,730,000 is recommended for 1935 for forest roads and trails and $10,000,000 is authorized for such purposes for each of the fiscal years 1936 and 1937. In connection with the appropriation of $6,730,000 for the fiscal year 1935, the committee is advised that there is approximately $3,270,000 in existing appropriations not under contract at this time, which will make practically $10,000,000 available for contract for the fiscal year 1935.

The sum of $2,500,000 is recommended for 1935 for roads over public lands and over other Federal reservations, and $2,500,000 in addition is authorized to be appropriated for each of the fiscal years 1936 and 1937.

No appropriation is recommended for roads for national parks and monuments for 1935, there being a balance of $11,000,000 in existing appropriations not under contract. The committee, however, is recommending an authorization of $5,000,000 for such roads for each of the fiscal years 1936 and 1937.

For construction and improvement of Indian reservation roads, $2,000,000 is recommended to be appropriated for 1935 and authorizations for the appropriation of $2,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1936 and 1937 are recommended.

For the emergency construction of public-building projects outside of the District of Columbia there is recommended a total of $65,000,000. In the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932 an appropriation of $100,000,000 was made for the construction of public buildings to be selected from projects in House Document 788, Seventy-first Congress. Under the authority contained in the act entitled "An act for the relief of unemployment through the performance of useful public work, and for other purposes", approved March 31, 1933, there was diverted from this appropriation of $100,000,000 the approximate sum of $93,000,000. The committee is advised that of the projects which might have been constructed under the $93,000,000 so diverted, projects totaling approximately $28,000,000 have been provided for out of Public Works Administration funds, leaving $65,000,000 of the $93,000,000 which, but for such diversion, could have been used for public buildings.

In recommending the appropriation of $65,000,000, the committee has required that the projects to be carried on under this amount shall be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, acting jointly, from lists of buildings which will be found in Statements Nos. 2 and 3 appearing in the committee report on this bill. Statement No. 2 consists of projects in House Document No. 788, funds for which have not been allocated by the Public Works Administration, and Statement No. 3 consists of projects not in House Document No. 788 but which have been submitted through the Treasury Department to the Public Works Administration for consideration and for which funds have not been allotted. The provision in the bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General to select for prosecution under this appropriation such other projects not included in these lists as, in their judgment, are economically sound and advantageous to the public service. The appropriation is made to the Treasury Department and the selection of the projects, including the sites, is required to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, acting jointly, and they, in making these selections, are required to distribute the projects equitably throughout the country so far as may be consistent with the needs of the public service and with a view to aid in relieving country-wide unemployment.

The committee has also incorporated in the bill a paragraph requiring the transfer from the Public Works Administration to the Treasury Department of $2,500,000, such sum, when approved by the President, to be used by the Secretary of the Treasury in the construction of public buildings provided for under the appropriation in the bill or for projects for which allotments have been made to the Treasury Department by the Public Works Administration, in cases in which the bid of the lowest responsible bidder exceeds the amount available for the project, the total amount to be added to the limit of cost of any project, either under allotment from the Public Works Administration or fixed otherwise, not to be more than 10 percent of the allotment or limit of cost.

There will be available under this bill by allocation of the President, if he so desires, $285,000,000 for carrying on the Civilian Conservation Corps until March 31, 1935, the date of the expiration of the act under which that work was organized.

For public works under the National Recovery Act there may be made available a total of not to exceed $500,000,000, which includes an estimated figure of $41,000,000 for naval construction under the recent act of Congress, $190,000,000 to complete construction of projects under P.W.A. already under way, $2,500,000 to be transferred from P.W.A. to the Treasury Department to complete public buildings under allotments already made by P.W.A., leaving of the $500,000,000 approximately $267,000,000 for new allotments.

Of the funds made available for allocation by the President, figures were presented to the committee indicating that approximately $48,000,000 would be required for the next fiscal year to carry on the work of the Tennessee Valley Authority in forwarding the program for power and fertilizer and other development of that area.

In the emergency appropriations in title II of the bill there are carried several other large items. Two appropriations—one for $75,000,000 and one for $7,950,000—are carried under the Treasury Department, thought the funds are administered by the Farm Credit Administration. The larger item, $75,000,000, is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to make subscriptions to the paid-in surplus of Federal land banks to enable them to defer payments of principal and interest on loans to farmers secured by mortgages and the smaller sum, $7,950,000 is to make payments to Federal land banks on account of the reduction in interest rates on mortgages held by such banks in accordance with section 24 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933.

For the Bureau of Internal Revenue a total of $10,000,000 is recommended for the fiscal year 1935, of which the sum of $3,200,000 is for the carrying on of an intensive drive for the collection of back taxes, to examine income-tax returns which are escaping examination, to administer new tax provisions of the Revenue Acts of 1932 and 1934, and to collect the taxes imposed by the Liquor Taxing Act of 1934; and $6,800,000 is for the Alcohol Tax Unit for the enforcement of the internal-revenue laws relating to intoxicating beverages. This latter sum, together with the appropriation previously provided for the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol, will provide a total of approximately $11,000,000 for the fiscal year 1935 for the enforcement of all laws relating to alcohol and alcoholic beverages.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the bill contain any provision for drought relief in the Middle West?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will discuss that matter. Six hundred and forty million dollars additional was the amount estimated by Mr. Hopkins as being sufficient to complete the job of relief. Five hundred million dollars was requested as the limit estimated for Public Works. When we figure up all the earmarking and tentative allocations in this bill we find the direct appropriations do not provide the necessary amount of money for the program by $574,000,000. There is, however, a clause in the bill that the President, in his discretion, can draw upon the unobligated balances of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make up this amount and any additional amount that circumstances and conditions may demand throughout the next fiscal year for the purposes of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and Public Works under the National Recovery Act, the latter purpose being limited to $500,000,000 from direct appropriations and R.F.C. funds.

Therefore the President may have to draw upon the R.F.C., probably, for $574,000,000. He can draw upon the R.F.C. for more than that if conditions demand it, because he is given the authority to do that for relief purposes. Therefore, this is an expanding program so far as relief is concerned.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Is the gentleman making any provision for education in this bill? In my State over one-half of the schools that have been receiving F.E.R.A. aid will not open September 1 unless such provision is made for them.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the gentleman will read the hearings he will find there is a statement in the break-down of the funds made by Mr. Hopkins in which $48,000,000 is estimated to be set aside for education.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. That is not one-fifth ot enough to meet the needs throughout the country during the next year.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am sorry if it is not one-fifth enough. I have heard that time and again before and since these hearings. If we complied with every demand of that character we would bankrupt the Nation in 48 hours. We cannot do it.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does not the gentleman think we would better suspend public building for the time being and keep the schools of America open?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not. I think every avocation, every calling, and those engaged in labor of every kind should receive equal treatment at the hands of the Government. If there is one principle that should apply, control, and govern our action, it is that the burdens of government should rest equally upon the shoulders of all and its blessing, like the dews of heaven, should descend equally upon the heads of all.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. That is what those of us who favor Federal relief for education at this time are advocating. We want the burden spread so that our schools may remain open.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We are providing $48,000,000, which is a just proportion, and it is estimated that this will be a sufficient amount to relieve distress in education throughout the Nation, including all the rural communities.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. With reference to drought relief, it is estimated, is it, there will be no special appropriation for drought relief, but that such sums as are necessary will come under the arrangement that is proposed in this bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It was so contemplated when we held these hearings. Since that time the drought has spread until it has covered practically 27 States. Since that time there have been committees appointed by the House and Senate to advocate $1,000,000,000 for drought relief. Just what course the Administration is going to take on this, I do not know, but I do know that the President will have ample authority to provide ample funds to take care of it under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the gentleman think there are ample funds available under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. There are ample funds and ample authority to make them available.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the estimates upon which this bill is based for emergency purposes are $1,172,000,000 of direct appropriations. This is not sufficient to meet the demands of the bill. The President may have to draw on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for $574,000,000, making a total of $1,746,000,000.

This amount is approximately divided in the following manner subject to allocation by the President with the exception of $272,325,000 which is appropriated for specific projects:

Items specifically appropriated:
Public highways in States		$100,000,000
Forest roads and trails, public-land roads, and Indian-reservation roads		11,230,000
Public buildings		65,000,000
Treasury Department items:
Office of the Secretary	$100,000
Federal land banks:
Reduction in interest-rate mortgages	7,950,000
Subscriptions to paid-in surplus	75,000,000
Emergency Banking Act 1933, and Gold Reserve Act of 1934, expenses	3,000,000
Bureau of Internal Revenue	10,000,000
Secret Service Division	45,000
		96,095,000
Total of specifically appropriated items		272,325,000
Other activities and amounts tentatively estimated to be allocated from the general appropriation of $899,675,000 and R.F.C. funds in case of F.E.R.A. and P.W.A.):
Tennessee Valley Authority (to come from general appropriation)		48,000,000
Executive Office Building, addition and furnishing (from general appropriation)		325,000

Other activities and amounts tentatively estimated, etc.—Continued.
Civilian Conservation Corps (from general appropriation)	$285,000,000
Federal Relief Administration (from general appropriation, P.W.A., and R.F.C.)	640,000,000
Public Works Administration, including naval construction (from general appropriation and R.F.C.)	500,000,000
Total of allocations (from general appropriation and R.F.C.)	1,473,325,000
Total of direct appropriations and estimated draft on R.F.C. funds	1,745,650,000

This presents to you the picture of additional emergency funds that our great President, who is as far above the ordinary man as the mountain peaks are above the bottom of the sea, who is seeking to take this country out of the depression with the least possible burden to the taxpayers, must be supplied with for the next fiscal year.

My colleagues, whether Republicans or Democrats, this is a call by your Nation, by your President, to aid him in removing this country from the depression and relieve from starvation to plenty with the least possible expense to the taxpayers of the country. Therefore I call on you to rally behind this bill and aid him in his endeavor to bring relief to our country.

My Democratic colleagues, he has the right and the country has the right, to expect you to stand by him and this important administration.

My Republican friends, you, as patriots, I believe, should stand behind this program. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I think the House of Representatives and the country should have somewhat of a picture of the situation, and know something about what we are doing by this bill. I think the House of Representatives should vote on it on its merits, not through fear or party loyalty, because it is such a big measure and has so many different slants to it that it is absolutely necessary, if we are going to progress toward recovery, to stop this sort of thing.

Now, this bill carries directly approximately $1,178,000,000 for so-called "relief purposes." Some of them are for relief and some of them are absolutely the contrary.

Indirectly it carries as high as $4,000,000,000, and under certain circumstances perhaps a billion dollars more out of the funds of the R.F.C. These figures will not appear in the Budget. Indirectly, through possible reallocation of funds of the P.W.A., now existing, and leaving for future Congresses to pay for the projects as high as one billion and a half may be added to this bill. So there is, in addition to this, at least a possibility of five and a half billion dollars in addition to more coming through the revolving fund, which is created by the terms of the language, on page 63, last paragraph, where it is provided that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to buy any bonds or other obligations issued by the beneficiaries of grants from the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for the purpose of construction and financing in whole or in part by such Administration. That revolving fund can go into almost any figures. The selling of securities and liquidating of loans held by R.F.C. can go to very large figures.

Mr. Speaker, we have not followed the policy which was laid down for us by the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on the floor last winter, when he told us how bad it is—and it was a fine patriotic statement the gentleman made at that time—for us to have two appropriating authorities, one the Congress and the other the Board of Public Works. We have not followed the advice that the Chairman of the Committeee on Appropriations gave to us on that occasion, and we should follow it. Congress should make the appropriations that Congress, under the Constitution, is charged with making. It should make the allotments; it should not turn over to some man who has had no experience in governmental affairs such a job as the allotment of large sums for Public Works.

And what do we get as a result of that kind of performance? We get such propositions as this Fort Peck Dam in Montana, which will probably cost $90,000,000; we get such propositions as this Columbia River Basin project, which will cost probably $200,000,000; we get such projects, absolutely without excuse, as the Tygart River proposition in West Virginia, which will cost $12,000,000. We get such propositions as the upper Missouri River, where the traffic density cannot be enough to justify the expenditure. We get such projects as the upper Mississippi River proposition, where the traffic density cannot possibly warrant it, costing millions and millions of dollars, which Congress had not authorized and would not authorize because they could not be justified. Those are just a few examples of the things that have been done. I have not been able to cover the whole operation because I have not time, so I have just given you a few outstanding examples of that abuse of authority, and yet here in this bill we turn over to that same incompetency our job of appropriating money, and with that paragraph which I have read to you there can run as a result of pyramiding as high as two and a half or three billion dollars for that man at the head of the Department of Public Works to allocate, to bolster up those operations of the Government of the United States, where it has been alleged that we have saved money as to the result of the operations of the Budget. I want the House of Representatives and the people to realize what we are proposing to do.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I cannot until I have finished what I have in mind to say. I hope that the Congress will vote this down and will decide that we must allocate the funds that we are appropriating, that we must put them where we know they ought to be. I should not oppose a reasonable appropriation for relief, but for wildcat expenditures, for absolute incompetent allotment, I will not go along with anybody.

On rivers and harbors we have a committee of the House of Representatives, headed by our friend from Texas, Mr. MANSFIELD. That committee goes over things pretty carefully, and has some idea about how things ought to be done. We are not doing things according to their reports and taking care of river-and-harbor projects which ought to be taken care of. We have but $16,000,000 for rivers and harbors for new works, to be let after July 1, and less than half of that for projects that are not these foolish projects that the Board of Public Works has provided for—less than half for projects authorized by Congress, nothing for projects which the committee has considered. If we are going to spend all this money, we ought to spend it for something that will do the people some good and not for wildcat projects which incompetency dictates.

I shall give you a little picture now of what the situation actually is with reference to relief and the way things have worked out in this bill.

In the spring of 1933 we had the so-called "relief bill", $3,300,000,000. Of appropriations transferred to C.C.C. there was $300,000,000, and we had the Federal Relief Administration, not through the Budget but through the R.F.C., $500,000,000, a total of $4,100,000,000.

This year in February we carried for relief $950,000,000, and we were told at that time that it was estimated that that would carry us through until Congress came back here again. We passed the agricultural relief bill, $150,000,000. Directly by this bill we are asked to appropriate $1,172,000,000, and indirectly through bond sales to the R.F.C. for the P.W.A. we are asked to provide $350,000,000 in this bill. Indirectly, through R.F.C. for relief, there is proposed for more bonds such as we are asked to provide, approximately three billion and a half dollars, a total of $6,122,000,000. In addition to that, under this bill by reallotment of P.W.A. funds for immediate use, we can use one billion and a half more, or a total of $7,622,000,000.

On May 1, 1933, the number of families on relief in this country was 4,252,443. There was an estimate of the number of persons employed on public works of one kind or another, of 100,000, making approximately 4,352,443 families.

On May 1, 1934, the number of families directly upon relief was 3,655,000. There were subsistent homesteaders, who are the same group, except that they are the group in the country districts, to the number of 600,000 families. There were 650,000 single persons, and they had estimated those in with the families on May 1, 1933. So I have taken one-third of them, as they generally figure three to the family, 220,000. There were on May 1, 285,000 families getting relief through the C.C.C. There were, through the P.W.A. at that time, 387,000 families provided, where one member was provided with a job, making a total on relief of 5,147,000.

Thus have we progressed toward recovery. I do not like to see that situation. I regret it, but just as we told you before, unless we stop this enlarged-scale relief and get down to earth and try to recover and present a definite program on which business can embark, we cannot expect progress.

I hope the House of Representatives will vote this kind of thing down and stop this sort of thing. Unless we do that, we are not going to progress toward recovery, and I want to see us look toward the sun and fight to restore that prosperity which is the due of this great country of ours. [Applause.] I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield the balance of his time?

Mr. TABER. I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON].

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret that this bill is being brought up under suspension and that amendments accordingly are barred, for I feel very keenly that there are some forms of relief vitally needed during the emergency, for which provision should be made. I have in mind particularly the plight of the schools, many of which will not open at all next fall unless some aid is forthcoming from the Federal Treasury. Those of us who are concerned for education hope that the Speaker, in the exercise of the power granted him last Friday, will permit consideration of the Douglass bill in order that there may be proper authorization for the expenditure of relief funds appropriated today or hereafter for distribution among the schools of the country. If this is not done, a grave responsibility will rest on the Members of this House.

The Douglass bill, which is on the calendar, is not a perfect measure, but it is the foundation upon which a better measure can be built if we are given an opportunity to consider it. Seventy-five million dollars is entirely inadequate; there should be no objection to providing at least half as much for saving the schools as this body, by passing the Cartwright bill, has already declared should be made available for road building. I would want the bill further amended so as to provide that these funds be distributed upon the basis of school enrollment, so as to meet adequately the needs of children in every part of the country. Surely, there should be no disposition to penalize those communities which tax themselves heavily for education by denying to them equal participation in Federal aid. Furthermore, we should provide definitely that the use of Federal funds should not carry with it Federal control over the schools, for the States and their subdivisions should be left as autonomous as they are today in matters of education.

This bill, in my opinion, should be amended, not only by providing at least $225,000,000 for education but by eliminating provisions for the expenditure of large sums for other purposes far less meritorious. As I have said on numerous occasions, there must be considerable doubt as to the efficacy of public works as a cure for unemployment. We have already dumped, or prepared to dump, $3,200,000,000 into public works without getting any results commensurate with the expenditure. England had a P.W.A. many years ago and gave it up as a mistake. The futility of this form of bootstrap lifting has already been demonstrated here, and why should we continue it? We cannot hope to prime an $85,000,000,000 pump—and that is the amount of income it must draw every year to make us prosperous again—with $3,200,000,000; and if we were to follow the fantastic suggestions of those who want to spend larger sums up to $10,000,000,000 we should only reach sooner what we may already be headed for—bankruptcy, rag-money inflation, and repudiation.

Only those public works should be undertaken at this time which can be justified on their merits. Among these are the Missouri River project in North Dakota, the Lac qui Parle project in Minnesota, and other projects designed to conserve the water resources of the country. Damming lakes and creating water reservoirs, restoring forests, and putting the lands upon the western plains—whose soil has been blowing away—back into grass are not only important undertakings but imperative if the Nation shall continue to be self-supporting. The emergency is too critical to permit the expenditure of a single dollar for unnecessary projects.

I commend the administration and the committee for holding the amounts earmarked for the construction of public buildings down to modest figures. My objection to the bill in its present form is that it does not go even farther in that respect. The relief needs of the people during the next year are due to be so great that I doubt whether we can afford to spend a single dollar that does not yield 100 cents' worth of the necessaries of life—food, clothes, shelter, and education—to the needy of the country, provide feed and seed to keep the agriculture of the Nation alive during the drought emergency, or conserve resources of land and water.

To prevent privation in the sun-baked States of the interior will alone require a billion dollars; anything less will be a waste. Much of the money we have sent into the Middle West thus far must be marked up as a total loss, because we have provided so inadequately that many of the cattle that have been kept alive have only been kept alive, and are now being taken out to be shot.

There should be time given for a fuller consideration of this measure than we can give it in 40 minutes. There should be opportunity to consider amendments, to strike out items that can be saved or postponed, and to insert others, the lack of which will spell disaster to the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN].

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, bringing up this bill which appropriates more than a billion dollars under the suspension of the rules means that the bill must be voted upon after 40 minutes of debate and without amendments. The only possible reason for such a procedure is that the Speaker [Mr. RAINEY], the Democratic leader [Mr. BYRNS], and the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. BUCHANAN], do not regard their own Democratic colleagues as being fit to legislate and capable to be entrusted with the power to amend this bill or to deliberate upon this bill. It is inconceivable that any Democratic Member is gullible enough to believe that this bill is brought up under such a gagged procedure in order to keep 114 Republicans and 5 Farmer-Laborite Members from running over 318 Democrats and thereby wrecking this bill.

There is no possible way to obtain the necessary two-thirds vote for this bill except that the Democrats practically in a mass vote for it. When they vote for the bill under these conditions they do something more than merely vote for a bill. They frankly concede their own inability to bear the responsibility of legislating. If this bill is voted down that does not mean the end of the appropriation. It simply means that the leadership will be required to bring this appropriation bill in under the general rules of the House, which will permit amendments and deliberation.

The Constitution provides that appropriation bills must originate in the House of Representatives. The purpose of that provision is to protect the people from the expenditure of their money by anyone except Representatives upon whom they have an opportunity to vote every 2 years. This protection is entirely destroyed when an appropriation bill is brought before the House which appropriates a lump sum for the President to expend very largely as he sees fit and under rules which prevent any possible amendments, deliberation, or consideration by the House. This bill has been written by the executive department and is being ramrodded through the House under this gag rule with Representatives—Republicans, Democrats, and Farmer-Laborites alike—denied any opportunity to amend or deliberate upon it. So far as the net results are concerned, the Executive might as well have the right to assess the taxes against the people and to expend the money to suit himself without any check by the Representatives elected by the people. This procedure is a hypocritical and a cowardly way of turning back Anglo-Saxon government to the days before the Magna Carta. The manner in which this bill is being considered is hypocritical and deceptive repudiation of the Constitution and a destruction of the people's rights and protection. The manner in which this bill is being considered is a hypocritical and deceptive keeping of the color of the Constitution and an annihilation of the soul and the spirit of the Constitution in the matter of making appropriations. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised that my colleague on the other side of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN], should criticize the fact that we bring up this bill for over a billion dollars under suspension of the rules. I wonder if his memory is so short that he has forgotten what I might almost call the disgraceful proceedings that happened on last Friday, when the small Republican minority, by insisting upon technicality after technicality, and the reading of the Journal in full, compelled seven roll calls, and took up the time of the House in the closing days of the session trying to defeat needed and beneficial legislation? That is the reason why we called up this bill under suspension of the rules. [Laughter.] Oh, you Republicans may laugh, but you may just as well understand now that while you were in the majority you passed legislation and did business, and while we are in the majority we will pass legislation and transact business for this country and not be deterred by you in the effort. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman consider that the Tarver bill which we considered last week was serious emergency legislation?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague on the other side, the distinguished member of my committee [Mr. TABER], and the other distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] said with tears in their voices that they regretted we were going to call on the R.F.C. to furnish some of this money. Far better that we do that than that we appropriate more money out of the Treasury. Whatever money the R.F.C. can get has already been authorized by Congress, and it may be spent otherwise. We had better call on that money instead of making additional appropriations directly from the Treasury.

The gentleman says there ought to be a limitation on the expenditure for relief. How do you western Members feel about that? The unprecedented drought has now covered practically 27 States of the great Northwest. How do you western Republicans feel about a limitation? How do you Democratic Congressmen from the affected areas feel about the imposition of a limitation on funds carried here for relief purposes? Why, these gentlemen advocate putting a limitation on funds for relief purposes and letting people starve.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman make the statement that this will be the only bill we shall be asked to pass upon for drought relief?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not know what will be done in the future; I cannot predict what Congress is going to do. I tried a prediction on the independent offices bill without much success.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman believe that we should entrust Mr. Hopkins or a department of the Government to expend the funds necessary for relief without Congress knowing how these funds are to be expended?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I believe in Congress entrusting to those men who are thoroughly informed upon the problem of relief the expenditure of funds when their authority is safeguarded by the sound discretion of one of the wisest men who ever served as President of the United States. [Applause.]

The gentleman must recall that we have Mr. Hopkins' commitment in this hearing that $640,000,000 is all he will need. Besides, we do not provide him with that much unless approved and authorized by the President of the United States.

Mr. RICH. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: If the President of the United States is going to authorize the expenditure of these funds, the gentleman knows—and I believe every Member of the House knows—that the President must eventually turn these matters over to others; that in the very nature of things the President is unable to exercise all the authority Congress has delegated to him, but must in turn delegate it to someone else; and the President is unable to fathom what will be done by the departments, bureaus, and individuals to whom he delegates discretion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yielded for a question, not for a speech.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman think they are better able to take care of this than is the Congress?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I cannot yield further. It would be better, I may say to my colleague, if some of us would delegate our power to others who know more about certain subjects than we do.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. For a brief question.

Mr. COLDEN. Inasmuch as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been loaning money to banks, railroads, and insurance companies, is it not consistent that this Corporation should also loan funds for relief?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Absolutely. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I am actively supporting and voting in favor of this meritorious measure today. I appreciate the honor the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee has given me of closing the debate on the bill. It is needless to say that a measure as soundly and logically put together as this will carry. It will pass because it provides sufficient funds to take care of those needs throughout the country which we know still exist. It carries on the program of relief and restoration which has marked the forward progress of the new deal. Objections have been raised lately that this new deal was not what the people voted for in November 1932.

Mr. Speaker, when the people of the United States chose Franklin D. Roosevelt to work over and replace the outworn and outvoted economic machine of his predecessor in office, they did not designate a particular course for him to follow. Their hope, which has been more than justified, was that he would live up to his pledge that the time for action had come. The last session of this Congress aided him to the best of its ability in rebuilding the governmental machine for the benefit of all the people. The work of restoring prosperity to the United States, however, is not yet complete, and it is necessary that large additional expenditures for relief and Public Works still be made. The progress, favorable so far, must be completed, and through this appropriation measure Congress is furnishing the fuel with which to keep the reconstructed machine in motion.

My friends, I am particularly gratified over the provision in the bill which creates a vast reservoir upon which the President may draw by use of funds from unexpended balances of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Public Works Administration. In addition thereto the provision authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to buy any bonds or other obligations issued by beneficiaries of grants from the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for the purpose of construction, provides a revolving fund of vast extent, not only for the perfection of the present Public Works allotments but of those worthy ones which are pending and which have either received approval or are under examination. I do not share the fear expressed that this authorization is dangerous. Instead I consider it one of the most meritorious provisions of the bill.

There are certain public projects in which I have been keenly interested; among others, the Central Valley water project in California, one which is still under examination and consideration by the Public Works Administration. It is a project that will be of inestimable value to the people of that great valley, if its structure shall be found to meet with the requirements of the administration. I am aware that at this time, funds could not be earmarked for this project, nor for any other particular project, but I consider it a fortunate thing that under the terms of this bill and under the revolving fund, which is here established, there will be power and authority to perfect the aims and purposes of the National Industrial Recovery Act. I am hopeful that the Central Valley water project will be approved, and in the course of time the President and the Public Works Administration may see the wisdom of allocating sufficient funds to begin the construction of this vast and worthy project.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is particularly gratifying to know that there exists such an unexpended balance in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, because it shows that the recovery is real and actual. The demands made upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation not having been what they were anticipated to be, this money is left free to continue the work of general relief and real recovery under the new deal without additional appropriations by the Congress.

RELIEF FOR OUR EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it seems that relief measures usually deal with conditions directly related to industry, finance, or agriculture, of course, excepting the appropriations to provide food, clothing, and shelter for impoverished and needy people, which is a part of the emergency-relief program.

The time has come, however, when we must give serious consideration to relief measures for the benefit of our public-school system. Curtailed appropriations and inability to collect school taxes in many communities and States have created a condition that is serious. Expenditures for school purposes have decreased nearly $500,000,000 since 1928. This represents nearly one-fourth of the entire amount previously expended. New buildings are seldom even thought of. Consequently schoolrooms are overcrowded and the teaching force is required to struggle along with improper and insufficient equipment.

Whether the subject be approached from the standpoint of employment or importance of the work being done, there is no call for relief that comes with greater or more certain justification. Nor is there any other activity so necessary to our public welfare.

The tremendous importance of the "industry"—and I think we may correctly so term it, as it is engaged in character building and providing the necessary equipment for our boys and girls to lead useful lives and become good citizens—can be understood when it is realized that approximately 30,000,000 of our population are engaged in its work either as students, teachers, or otherwise. The number of employees exceeds that of any other industry, and its pay roll is exceeded only by that of the combined railroads of the country.

The salaries paid for this important class of work are grossly inadequate in the great majority of cases. This is particularly true in rural communities. The number of teachers employed in 1933–34 was approximately 860,000; about 450,000 were rural teachers. Only half of these received more than $750 per year and the remainder less than the minimum wage paid to unskilled labor under the N.R.A. codes now in effect. In fact, nearly 100,000 of them received less than $450 per year. The teachers who have worked and struggled through the depression on such a pittance of salary have shown true nobility of spirit. But what shall be said of the thousands of teachers who have performed their daily tasks and received no pay for their services? It is estimated that on the 1st of March, this year, there was owing to teachers for salaries unpaid approximately $55,000,000, and that in addition to this amount there were unpaid warrants outstanding amounting to nearly $50,000,000. Over $100,000,000 past due and owing to teachers for services already rendered. These teachers, though unremunerated, were willing to perform their duties, keep the school doors open, and thus permit America's greatest industry to carry on. Words cannot pay the tribute they so richly deserve.

But what is to be done about it? If this Nation is justified in extending millions and millions of dollars for relief to railroads, financial institutions, and others, it is amply justified in extending relief to our sorely stricken school system, its teachers, and other employees. The greatest and most valuable asset that America possesses is its educational system. Its continuance is vital. Parent-teacher organizations, educational leaders, and thoughtful citizens, who think in terms of America's welfare, are awake to the danger ahead if these conditions are permitted to continue without adequate relief being provided. It is our duty to heed the call. To do otherwise would be to fail in the performance of a public trust.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL—1935

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that every Member of the House may have 5 legislative days within which to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 311, nays 46, not voting 74, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—THE DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend remarks on the subject of the deficiency appropriation bill, I want to take this opportunity of recording my personal appreciation and my official approval of the very splendid record made by the General Accounting Office.

As chairman of the subcommittee handling the independent offices appropriation bill, I have had occasion for the past few years to have a very close and intimate knowledge of the workings of this Office. I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment the General Accounting Office, under the able administration of the Honorable John R. McCarl, the Comptroller, is one of the most useful and efficiently organized departments of the Government. It is unique in that it is one of the few branches of the Government that is self-sustaining. The very nature of the work done by the Comptroller brings him often into conflict with departmental heads, members of the Cabinet, the legislative branch of the Government, and sometimes, perhaps, the Chief Executive. The Comptroller is charged with the duty, under the law, of seeing to it that funds appropriated by Congress are expended in the manner for which they were appropriated, and in accordance with law.

The work of this Department has assumed gigantic proportions since the establishment of the many emergency organizations of the Government, and I think I express the sentiments of the entire Appropriations Committee, as well as of many Members of Congress, when I say that the administration and the taxpayers are fortunate in having this great Office to keep guard over public expenditures.

This bill carries an appropriation for the General Accounting Office to enable that establishment to employ additional help, to purchase additional equipment and supplies, and to rent space in order to enable it to take care of the vast increase in the volume of its legal, claim, audit, and investigation work arising out of the expenditures made by the many emergency organizations, including governmental corporations. The number of vouchers to be audited by that Office in the next year will be doubled; thousands and thousands of additional claims will be received for settlement; many more decisions must be rendered by the Comptroller General; and the auditing and settling of transportation vouchers and claims will be vastly increased. The number of Treasury checks received in a year that must be properly handled will be increased from 32,000,000 to approximately 100,000,000. In fact, the volume of work throughout the entire Office will also be increased.

In the division of the General Accounting Office that audits all postal accounts there is a need for additional employees to aid in catching up with the audit of money-order and of postal-savings accounts. It should be borne in mind that for the current fiscal year the regular appropriation for the General Accounting Office was cut about $400,000 and consequently the Office could not keep abreast with the increase in postal savings accounts and money-order accounts. That Office has been receiving 130,000 more money orders each day than it could dispose of, and by July 1 it will be about 40,000,000 behind in its audit of money orders.

The receipt of postal-savings accounts has increased abnormally. You will have some idea of this vast increase when I tell you that on June 30, 1930, the amount on deposit in postal savings was $175,271,686, and on June 30, 1933—3 years later—the amount on deposit had jumped to $1,187,183,373, and I was recently informed that the amount on deposit in postal savings has now passed the two billion mark. The General Accounting Office now has on hand over 20,000 unaudited postal-savings acounts.

My understanding is that the expenditures under emergency activities and governmental corporations will amount to something like six or seven billion dollars for the year. The President has, by Executive order, directed an audit to be made of these accounts by the General Accounting Office. My personal opinion, and I think that of the committee, is that all emergency expenditures should be audited as carefully and correctly as is humanly possible, and I am firmly convinced that this appropriation for the General Accounting Office will be a splendid investment.

In this connection I feel it would not be amiss to state that from the time the General Accounting Office was established on July 1, 1921, up to the 1st of last July, it has caused recovery of sums in excess of $45,000,000, representing expenditures made contrary to law. In addition to this, this Office has prevented the illegal expenditure of millions of dollars.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, it is very unfortunate that the Members of the House are not granted time to debate this bill—deficiency appropriations—or propose proper amendments. I wish to urge that in the deliberations over this bill serious consideration be given to an increase of allocations in the sum of $1,000,000 for the purpose of stamping out this insidious drug traffic which has assumed alarming proportions on the Pacific coast. These habit-forming drugs of various kinds have for a long period of time, and are now, being smuggled into this country, Honolulu being the port of entry and the gateway to the Pacific coast, and Los Angeles the point of distribution.

No single item in this bill is of greater importance to the generation that will follow us than this. By tricks and artifices devised by the underworld leaders, boys and girls in our schools are induced to try these drugs just for the thrill and their use among the personnel of the Army and Navy is growing as it is with the civilian population. It is high time that we in Congress, recognizing the fact, take active steps to stop it. If this is to be done the narcotic division of the Treasury must have additional funds with which to employ trained operatives and we also must strengthen their hands by providing adequate penalties. Under the existing system, I am sorry to say, fines aggregating thousands of dollars are compromised by payment of a few hundred dollars and the guilty operators of this nefarious traffic released, only to have them redouble their activities so as to recoup their fortunes for even the pitiful fines imposed. More than that, the mild penalties inflicted serve as an invitation to others to engage in this traffic.

The fight which I have been making to stamp out this illegal traffic has attracted attention of sorrowing mothers and fathers of these unfortunate addicts all over the country. I have received letters of commendation from nearly every State in the Union from persons who know all too well the horrors of the drug traffic and my investigations, as well as those of experts in the narcotic division, convince me that this traffic is on the increase.

Previous to a trip I made to Honolulu, where I made investigations, as well as along the entire Pacific coast from San Diego to Seattle, I had first-hand information which was taken from the Bureau of Customs, Narcotic Division. These drugs shipped in from the Orient, are landed in Hawaii and quietly transshipped to various ports along the Pacific coast. There are syndicates operating with headquarters in Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and San Diego, and I have no doubt there is a master mind controlling their activities.

As an illustration of the magnitude to which this illicit traffic has grown, I wish to cite to you some figures which I obtained when I was in Honolulu. These figures represent seizures of opium made by Federal officers at that port. Within a period of approximately 5 months the seizures of smuggled opium made from 10 vessels aggregated 791 tins, having a value of $118,650; the fines imposed aggregated $74,229.84.

Under the present conditions only a handful of Federal agents are available to combat this evil. These men are doing splendid work. They are doing all they can to stamp out the traffic, I am sure, but the fact remains that it is increasing in alarming proportions and the $1,000,000 I am seeking in this amendment is little enough to provide the additional agents, who must be men of exceptional ability to ferret out the smuggling devices to which these operators resort.

This is not a mare's nest which has been trumped up to get money out of the Federal Treasury. When the tariff bill of 1930 passed the House it carried a provision whereby fines and penalties provided for drug smugglers might be placed jointly on the owners of the vessels and the masters of the ships found to have participated in the traffic. I am sorry to say that when this bill reached the Senate, despite a strong appeal made by Senator HIRAM JOHNSON, of California, this feature was stricken out. The House recognized the emergency before, and I am convinced it should do so again.

Many of you may not realize the devices and tricks to which the handlers of these drugs resort to sell their products. I have it on good authority that in one month in southern California alone there were no less than 3,000 forged narcotic prescriptions written. At least 50 people are engaged in this nefarious business of writing these forged prescriptions and reaping an unholy harvest from the unfortunate victims.

It is but fair to say that the druggists who fill these prescriptions are not to blame save in some instances. True, they may, if they see fit to do so, refuse to fill prescriptions where they do not know either the doctor or the person for whom it has been written. However, if the prescription appears to be offered in good faith and there is nothing on its face which is spurious, any druggist would hesitate to refuse to fill it. I can say that the Federal officers hold there are only a small percentage of the druggists who are not fully cooperating with me.

Mr. Speaker, this battle which the organized forces of civilization are waging against the soul-destroying influences of the illicit drug traffic profoundly affects the future generations of this Nation. None of us can see the ravages which this habit works on its unfortunate victims without wishing to join forces to stamp it out. We can do this with men and money, but we cannot do it simply by wishing for it. You are well aware that there is nothing more destructive of the manhood and womanhood of the future than the use of drugs, and when I tell you that their use is increasing at an alarming rate among children of high-school age, I am not overstating facts. We are spending millions for highways, millions for public works, millions on Federal buildings, millions for seed and feed loans, millions for loans to industry. I think the least we can do is to spend $1,000,000 more for the salvation of the boys and girls whose future usefulness is jeopardized by this unholy and dastardly traffic.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may take a homely observation to illustrate my position.

Yesterday as I looked down from my apartment house window I saw a horse, a beautiful, well-accoutered chestnut horse. His harness shone with brass, proudly and well groomed he stood, a beautiful animal with kindly eyes and sensitive features. He was hitched to a red-and-yellow milk truck. The horse looked proud; he looked as though he liked his job. I think he was proud, and yet about all he did was move that milk truck a single block and then stand and wait for half an hour while the milkman delivered to the great apartment houses on all sides. It seemed that he served but little purpose, but when that milk truck had to be moved the horse was mighty necessary, and then, with rare intelligence and without guidance or command, he moved forward another block and waited again. Otherwise, about all he seemed to be doing was staying hitched and obeying orders, and I wondered somehow if that horse was not leading pretty much the life of a Congressman, a good Congressman. That is what I am doing—just staying hitched and trying to intelligently obey the orders of my masters, the people, as I am able to interpret them.

I have no doubt the horse would have liked to march proudly down the street in all his splendor; I have no doubt he became impatient with the long delay, but he stayed hitched. Oh, I sometimes think I could write a better bill than this; I think I could take it to pieces and put it together again in better form, but it was not given to me to serve upon the committee whose duty it was to write this bill, and the open road is not before us, and we go but bit by bit, while the milk bottles, figuratively, are being delivered for the needs of a hundred and twenty million people. So, I am staying hitched.

I am not making this speech with the idea that it is necessary for the passage of this bill—but because it is the only way I have and is the eminently proper and appointed way by which I may convey my message to the American people, for it is not only a Congressman's duty to obey orders—and we are representatives and not rulers—but it is a Congressman's duty to advise his people of the force and effect, as he views it, of proposed legislation. In conformity with that thought, I am undertaking to give to you the benefit of my observations, the thoughts that have come to me at the Nation's Capital concerning the effect of this and kindred legislation upon the lives of the people, the States, and the Nation. Until I do this, my duty is not complete and the people are entitled to all the facts which may fit them as the final arbiters and rulers to determine the course of action which they may direct me to take.

This bill provides vast sums of money for direct relief; it provides vast sums for public works; it provides vast sums of money for our school system; it provides vast sums of money for subsistence homesteads, and the like, and all this money of necessity must be borrowed and must be repaid. I am in accord with the program as thus far carried into effect. When President Roosevelt and his administration took over the reins of government on March 4, 1933, business was at a standstill, industry was paralyzed, men, women, and children were pauperized and hungry, and it was necessary that this Government, as the great central agency of the States, should be called upon to lend the joint credit of the several States in an emergency the like of which had not been known in the history of this Nation, but I look with grave apprehension upon a condition which has arisen and which does not tend to ameliorate itself.

Granted that it is the duty of the central government to meet an emergency, it was not intended by Congress nor by the President that the central government should assume or take over the responsibilities, powers, and obligations which originally belonged to the States, and yet, since that emergency was first met by the Federal Government, the legislatures of the several States have assembled, and so far as I am aware, no effort has been made by the sovereign body of any one of the 48 States to assume the responsibilities and powers which properly belong to it.

Demand after demand is heard that the Federal Government continue to appropriate money and pour it into the treasuries of the States and municipalities of the Nation. Time was when States were jealous of their powers and prerogatives. Time was when they not only desired to enjoy the power of sovereignty, but when they were equally willing to assume the obligations incident thereto; and I say to you today that just as surely as the unused muscle dies and withers away, the sovereign State that fails to exercise its power, that fails to assume its own obligations and meet them by its own effort, just so surely will its sovereign power cease to exist.

From literally hundreds of my people I am receiving daily demands that Congress appropriate still greater sums of money for our school systems. I give place to no man in my desire to build up within my own State a school system second to none, but in my humble judgment that is a prerogative of the State and not of the Nation. It is idle to say that the State does not have the funds. Whatever funds are appropriated must be paid, and it can make no difference whether they are appropriated by the National Government or by the State government. Each one of us will in due time and turn be called upon to contribute his just proportion for the payment of whatever debts are created; and if your Federal Government builds your schoolhouses and pays your teachers, you may expect as surely as mortal things can be certain that the Federal Government will in due course take over the entire common-school system of America. Whether or not this is desirable is a matter the people of this Nation should first determine before they embark upon a permanent policy of directing appropriations by the Federal Government for the school system.

Referring for a moment to the matter of direct relief and the civil works administration's program, let me illustrate my position by the condition that prevails in my own district. In my own home county, during the first 16 weeks of the year 1934, there was spent by the Federal Government on civil works administration alone the sum of approximately $1,300,000. This put 4,500 men to work for 16 weeks at a minimum living wage, and at the end of that 16 weeks the money was gone, the jobs were gone, and nothing was gained and nothing accomplished—no useful work, broadly speaking, had been performed. At the same time, the lumber industry of the Northwest, which is undercapitalized, with its kindred industry of pulp and paper manufacturing, were making application to the Federal Government for loans aggregating $2,000,000. Every dollar thus borrowed would be secured by value of from three to five times the amount borrowed, and this $2,000,000 would have put the 2,000 men to work at permanent employment. It would have gone down through the years, and the Government would have recovered every dollar of its money advanced with a reasonable rate of interest; but most important of all, industry would have been rebuilt and enabled to live and function and employ men. It is my judgment, without attempting to criticize an emergency program, that our permanent program must be that of a rebuilding of industry rather than a stop-gap program.

I am standing hitched; I am going along. I am keeping faith with the President of the United States in his great program for the rehabilitation of America. This war upon depression must be fought on every front, and the Commander in Chief must in the last analysis plan the campaign with the aid of his advisers and counselors and those who believe in his cause. This war will be won and the enemy will be routed, perhaps to assemble again reorganized upon a new and different front. I look to the future and seek a remedy that may once and forever eradicate the cause of our present discontent. The cause, as I view it, rests in the fact that wealth has become centralized in the hands of the few, leaving a barren waste and meager existence for the many. Billionaires and paupers may not exist side by side and make a happy or contented nation; and, in my judgment, just as surely as tomorrow's sun may rise the time will come in your day and in mine when by governmental authority there will be a limit placed upon the amount of capital and wealth that any one man may own or control or from the benefits of which he may exclude his fellows. This, in my judgment, is neither socialistic nor idealistic; it is simply in harmony with the great plan of the President, a manifestation of progress that time and civilization have made essential to our national well-being. It is idle to talk about the free and untrammeled right of man to control property as being essential to his willingness to exert himself. It is not the right or power to capture or control wealth that makes ambition or willingness to work.

The great Master of the Universe, when He made each one of us, instilled within us such ambition as we have, such willingness to work, such desire to progress as we have or will have regardless of the amount of dross we may be able to acquire throughout the journey of life.

Aside from all that, the fixing of a reasonable limit will thwart no man's ambition or desire for gain within reasonable limits, but whether it would or not, it is more important that the well-being of the masses of our people, of the average man and woman who works and serves and tries to live the life of a good and useful citizen, should be protected rather than that a few giants should be fed and nurtured at the expense of the many.

We are all agreed that the problem of the moment is to provide work for the American people at a fair and decent living wage. We have tried the National Industrial Recovery Act, and much good has been accomplished; we have tried to rebuild the fortunes of the farmers, and much good has been accomplished; we have tried to raise the wages of labor, and, again I say, much good has been accomplished, but I believe this plan will not be complete; I believe the President's program will not be fulfilled until by some means we are able to get a purchasing power into the hands of the common people of this Nation. Many speak of an overproduction. There is no overproduction so long as men and women are hungry, so long as children are ill-nurtured and ill-clothed and unprovided for in the enjoyment of the simple wants of life.

In my judgment, if it were possible to place a purchasing power in the hands of the American people, all the factories of this Nation running at a full capacity night and day would not be able to supply the demands that their needs would require. Never in the history of this Nation was the stock on hand in the average family so low as it is today. Never was there a time when there existed such a potential order for consumable goods as exists today. I am not attempting now, nor do I care to argue the justice of the claim of the American veterans upon the Public Treasury. With the justice of the claim for immediate payment I am not concerned in this presentation, but I do say that if you can place two and one-half billion dollars in the hands of the average man and woman of this Nation—two and one-half billion dollars that will be spent tomorrow for consumable goods—you will revive industry within 30 days. I do know that this is a claim that must be paid in due time; I do know that by the issuance of United States Treasury notes, legal tender in their nature, and bearing no interest, we can pay that claim and rehabilitate the purchasing power of the American people. I do know that in my own home county it will bring $4,000,000 in new money, and into my neighboring county it will bring $11,000,000 in new money. If this can be done without cost to the Government, I say we are not carrying out the true intent of the President's program unless we so legislate, and I believe such legislation would go further toward rehabilitating America than all of the nearly $7,000,000,000 we are appropriating in this bill. Time will demonstrate the wisdom of that position and I venture it will be the next part and chapter of the program of this administration.

I should not conclude these remarks until I have sounded a warning that should be heard by every American who loves his country and its institutions. There are those among us who champ at the bit, who are impatient of the restraints of the Constitution of the United States.

Let me say to you here today that times like these bring forth those who are not steeped in reverence for their country's institutions, those who are careless of its history, and who look with longing upon strange fields. Let me adjure you to beware not only of the man who would undertake to scrap the Constitution but even of him who does not revere it.

What is this Constitution? Why, it is the covenant; it is the contract between you and me and our several States; it is born of the wisdom of our Pilgrim Fathers and the best thoughts of the best men of all the ages, of the common experience of mankind, that makes this Nation possible. It is a strange anomaly that in this Nation of ours, wherein the States have reserved to themselves the principal rights and powers of sovereignty, the Nation exists only by virtue of the Constitution. The Nation is the Constitution and the Constitution is the Nation. This Nation has no existence, no background, no past, and no future except that granted to it by the Constitution itself.

Scrap your Constitution and the Federal Government ceases to exist; it becomes but a confederation of States, each of which may go its separate way, choose its own form of government, or abandon government entirely tomorrow, and while we speak of these States as sovereign powers, and while each of them has reserved to itself the principal powers of sovereignty, the United States as a nation exists only by virtue of the Constitution, and not one of these 48 States, except for the Constitution, would be entitled to recognition under international law among the nations of the world. Scrap your Constitution, declare for one moment against its binding force, loosen one strand of its binding power, and this Nation will cease to exist, and these 48 States, with their hundred and twenty million people, with their hopes and fears, and joys and sorrows, will become a rich prey for such strong and designing powers as may seek to subjugate them.

Oh, but you say, we will disregard the Constitution and go the way this one or that one chooses. I say to you that if you disregard this Constitution, then you have ended its binding power, you have destroyed your Nation and your way is as good as mine, and my way as good as yours, and power alone may determine down which road lies journey's end.

If the time comes when it becomes desirable to meet new conditions so that the Constitution should be changed or amended, then change it or amend it in the manner that the covenant has provided, but let us never be patient with those who sneer at the Constitution as an archaic document.

We are embarked upon new ventures; we are striving for new ideals; we are trying to correctly weigh and determine human value. We are embarked upon the new deal, which, if I correctly interpret the words of the President, is not a program of absolutism but a program of trial and error and endeavor by experiment and experience to determine wherein lies the truth and what is best. For the first time in American history we have taken the American people into partnership in government. Experience will demonstrate our mistakes and, frankly, we shall go to the people, acknowledge our mistakes, and try to correct them, but we shall go to the people as partners and not as rulers, as representatives and not as governors—conscious of our human limitations and willing to be corrected for the common good.

The President of the United States personifies an ideal, the ideal of the American people of faith in our institutions, in the Constitution that creates and perpetuates our Government, and in the great spirit of liberty and progress that hovers over us and guides us on. I have a simple faith that each great crisis provides a leader endowed by an all-wise power, with the qualities of leadership suitable to the demands of the day. I believe in my simple faith that when a great people in common unity yearns and hungers for well-being, for progress, and for common good, a great and all-wise God looks down and guides the hand that leads us on toward fertile fields and greener pastures into the sunshine of happiness that ultimately shall and must be the common heritage of man.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 9830 gives to the officials of this Government the right and power to expend $1,178,000,000 directly. Should emergencies arise the Chief Executive has the power given him in this bill to spend many millions more, reaching into the billions. This bill is going to be passed by this House practically without discussion or knowledge on the part of most of the Membership of this House, and all in less than 2 hours.

I know the Appropriations Committee has given careful consideration to every detail of the vast and sweeping powers herein granted, but the entire Membership of this House should now be given the opportunity to discuss details of so important a measure. Members of the Appropriations Committee should answer every question that this Membership would ask if they had the chance. So severely to limit debate on such an important bill is wrong, and should be condemned by this House as it will be by the country. There is no necessity for such haste. It brings our Government into disrepute as it does the party which now holds the reins of power.

This direct appropriation is larger than the entire assessed value of the State which I help to represent on this floor. Such a sum of money is almost beyond comprehension, and it is only a fraction of the entire governmental expenditures this year.

This is not war nor a passing depression. We are in a new world; the old order is fast passing. The first and primary need of the hour is work for the unemployed. This is almost the middle of 1934, and we now have, and have had for years, around 10,000,000 unemployed, or at least 20 percent of the working population of our Nation. At least another 20 percent is employed only part time, and at wages less than enough to provide for a decent living. Then, think of the dependents. Practically one-half of our population is in want, or near the edge of despair.

The facts are that as a nation we are in desperate condition. Our total debt—individual, municipal, State, and national—amounts to more than the value of all the property of the Nation. We are in danger of bankruptcy and repudiation. The pride that we Americans used to take in meeting our obligations seems largely to have passed. The unemployed are here because of the use of machines, everywhere, and all kinds. This is distinctly a machine age, an age of plenty, of abundance for some. The machines cannot be abandoned. We cannot return to a primitive state. If this capitalistic civilization is to live, and we are to be able to retain even part of it, then drastic changes must take place at once. I appreciate what we know as the capitalistic civilization. It has given us most of the wonderful things we have and enjoy, but it has gone to seed, it has matured, it has ripened. May I enumerate what seem to me possible remedies?

First, interest, or paying money for use of money or credit, must be drastically reduced. Second, this Government must balance its Budget; so must every municipality and State. Laws of inheritance must be modified, and children and dependents, only, be given a part of vast estates, the balance reverting to the State and Nation. Income taxes as high as those in England must be imposed at once, reaching into the lower brackets, and taking large amounts from the higher brackets.

Then, the Government must take over all utilities like telephones, electric power plants, coal beds, and oil fields. They should become Government property, not at values now placed on such properties by the owners.

A growing tendency that is causing much concern is the assistance demanded of the Government for everything that in any way or manner affects the people. The Government is called upon to lend money to the farmer, the home owner, the big corporations, the small business man. The Government is called upon to open wide its purse for the drought victims and those suffering from devastating flood. The Government must furnish money for irrigation works and also for levees on the Mississippi. The Government must feed the hungry and unemployed.

It must clothe those in tattered garments. It is the Government here and the Government there. We have been told on this floor that the R.F.C. was organized for the purpose of unloading private debts on the shoulders of the public. I am beginning to believe that statement was true. Our people seem to have lost their self-reliance, their initiative. They want Government aid for everything. The citizens should support the Government instead of the Government supporting the citizens. It may be too late.

When I sit here and see billions voted, for raising which no provision has been made, which must, under the present plan, be met by new bond issues, well, I just wonder how far ahead is the breaking point.

May the Seventy-fourth Congress that will assemble here next January at once determine that not one dollar shall be spent beyond the anticipated revenue. May that coming Congress realize that the unemployed are here to stay until we make fundamental changes. It is jobs we want and must have by the millions so all may earn.

Access to the land must be given to those desiring to return to good Mother Earth again, to create, as their forefathers did, those things that support and clothe the human body. We have no choice; we must vote for this bill. Our greatest mistake has been in treating our present condition as a passing phase instead of a condition that has developed out of past events.

Every year we delay levying sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of government, so much the worse. Each succeeding year will become more difficult.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying to realize that the deficiency appropriation bill now before the House makes provision for relief for the unemployed by different Government agencies. In this connection I desire to emphasize the importance of the Civil Works Administration. The C.W.A. as a means to provide work relief for the unemployed justifies its continuation. When the program was set up, it was planned to take into its ranks approximately 4,000,000 of the unemployed throughout the Nation. For a period of a few months it did employ an average of 3,000,000. The inauguration of this form of relief was intended to give employment until industry could again provide normal employment for our workers.

The program of civil works when announced naturally created a new spirit of hope in the thousands of harassed, unemployed, and incomeless families in every State. However, in less than 3 months after the work had started notice was given that working hours would be curtailed with income greatly decreased, and, that by May 1, the entire program would be discontinued. This announcement dashed the hopes of millions to the ground. It was cruel and unjustified. It created a feeling among those who suffered that the Government had turned its back upon them.

The civil-works program, while in progress, demonstrated its value as an alternative to public works. Millions of dollars have been appropriated for public works of every kind and description, Federal, State, and local, as a means of providing employment, and yet scarcely any have, as yet, been expended. The program of public works was encompassed with endless red tape, and has, up to the present time, proved a failure. The dilatory tactics of those intrusted with its management has destroyed its usefulness as an employment program. The C.W.A. program, however, proved swifter and more flexible in getting men to work and freeing purchasing power. Furthermore, it opened up an entirely new range of emergency services as a balance to the usual labor and skilled work called into play by public works. It succeeded as a work relief program while the public-works program failed. With industry and P.W.A. still lagging and unable to provide employment, the C.W.A. or some similar agency must continue.

The C.W.A. program has also demonstrated its value as an alternative to relief. By putting greatly increased numbers of people actually to work, it has alleviated some of the deadening effects of enforced idleness and the discouraging hunt for jobs. Its second and perhaps greatest accomplishment has been to place cash in the hands of families whom unemployment and our relief methods had stripped of spending power. Thus it not only puts money in circulation but gives a large group of people, for a short time at least, a chance at living more normally. It recognizes the wisdom of putting enough spending power in the hands of unemployed people so that the minimum necessities of life might be provided for as well as food. Consideration should be given to the extension of this policy of making cash benefits a part of the expenditures of Federal relief funds put at the disposal of States and cities.

In view of the fact that, from present indications, it will not be possible within the next few months to provide employment through public works, seasonal activities or business revival, for the millions of workers still unemployed, a duty, as well as the need, requires that the C.W.A. shall be reestablished and continued on an extensive basis.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, while I recognize the responsibility of Congress to provide for the necessary appropriations to operate this Government and its various departments, and that we are required in times like the present to make the necessary appropriations to take care of the emergencies that are facing the people of this country, and for that reason I supported such appropriation and voted for the bill as a whole; yet there are certain items in this bill that I am fundamentally opposed to and wish to take this occasion to register my opposition to them and to state, if the opportunity had been available, I would have voted against them.

These items appear in title 1 on page 2 of the bill, appropriating the sum of $8,500 each, a full year's salary, to eight widows of deceased Congressmen, and the sum of $8,500, a year's salary to the daughters of a deceased Congressmen, amounting in all to the sum of $76,500, and the sum of $35,378 to contestants and contestees in election contests for Congress.

I especially object to the appropriating of $43,591 for the International Institute of Agriculture in Italy. I voted against this appropriation twice last year and find it appears in this appropriation bill again this year.

I also object to the appropriation of $8,000 for International Conference for Revising the Industrial Property Convention at London, England; $16,000 for International Technical Consulting Committee on Radio Communications, Lisbon, Portugal; $14,000 for Third Pan American Financial Conference, Santiago, Chile, and Commercial Conference, Buenos Aires, Argentina.

While I am not objecting to emergency appropriations that are absolutely necessary, I do question the advisability and the right of Congress in the placing of amounts running up into billions of dollars of public funds and credits in the hands of any one person, be he the President of the United States or anyone else, to be transferred and applied according to his discretion, as provided in title 2 of this bill.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, this is the last appropriation bill that will be passed by the Seventy-third Congress, and the Appropriation Committee's work for the year is over. I want to take this opportunity to commend the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], for the very able way in which he has presided over the deliberations of our committee. [Applause.] He has always shown unfailing courtesy to the members of the minority and never once tried to shut them off during the hearings and during the meetings of the committee. As a member of the minority, may I take this occasion to thank the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], for his courtesy and the ability with which he has presided over the Appropriations Committee. [Applause.]

EXCISE TAX ON PHILIPPINE COCONUT OIL

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD in connection with my own remarks a letter which I have received from Mr. Quezon of the Philippine Senate on the McDuffie resolution suspending effective date of excise tax on coconut oil from the Philippines.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUEVARA. The telegram is as follows:

Commissioner GUEVARA,
Washington, D.C.:

Strongly urge earnest consideration and prompt action McDuffie resolution suspending effective date excise tax Philippines coconut oil. Believe if action is deferred until next session will result in serious and unjustified interruption trade relations here. I am firmly convinced investigation will prove imposition tax unwarranted and detrimental interests both countries; believe this should be definitely determined prior to effective date thereof.

QUEZON.

DIVERSIFICATION OF COTTON FARMERS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of diversified farming in the Cotton Belt.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, for more than 20 years I have given close and very continuous study to the farm problems affecting the southern cotton farmer. Of course, if he could be assured of a good price of cotton, to wit, not less than 15 cents a pound every year for all the cotton that he could produce, he would not have to worry about diversification. But statistics show that the more cotton the southern farmer grows the less he gets for it. The total money paid for a bumper crop is less than the total money paid for a very small crop. Consequently, it is to the interest of the southern cotton farmer to reduce his total cotton production. I mean, it is to the interest of all southern cotton farmers throughout the Cotton Belt to produce not exceeding 10,000,000 bales per year, certainly for the next 2 or 3 years, until the existing carry-over can be reduced to a normal carry-over.

But, Mr. Speaker, the problem confronting the Southern cotton farmer in consequence of reduction in acreage is one of what he will do with the spare land and the spare time made available through such reduction program. In trying to solve this dilemma, I have studied the question from every angle, in all parts of this country and in most of the European countries. Consequently, I have come to the conclusion that the Southern cotton farmer must pursue a very systematic form of diversification if he is ever again to become prosperous. That diversification will make possible soil building, through the use of more animals, such as cows, on the ordinary farm, and rotation of crops, and very especially the planting of these lands in crops that leave a large amount of humus in the ground. This will mean that the farmer will produce his cotton without going into debt, because he will sell every week in the year enough of other products to support himself and family while producing the cotton. Systematic diversification will enable the southern cotton farmer, through the use of creameries, canneries, slaughterhouses, and poultry-and-egg assembling plants, all adequately serviced with cold-storage facilities, to escape the terrific burden of buying commercial fertilizers now made necessary, will enable him and his family to live well without having to go continuously to the grocery stores, and ultimately will set our cotton farmers free from the load of debt under which they have staggered for a generation or more.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for the information of my colleagues and of many constituents, I am offering to be printed as a part of my remarks a letter written by me to my fellow citizen, the Honorable L. P. Slattery, of Greenville, S.C., on October 17, 1933, and printed in the Laurens Advertiser, a weekly newspaper published in my native county of Laurens, S.C. I may never live to see the fruition of the efforts I have made to encourage diversification for the Southern cotton farmers, but I believe with complete confidence that the next generation will find such diversification their only salvation, and they will be compelled to turn to it. This is especially true of the farmers in the Piedmont section of South Carolina. That section is one of the richest parts of the world, in the content of iodine in the soil. That soil is the result of the disintegration of certain rocks possessing an unusually high content of iodine. This iodine is in the clay, and when the clay becomes soil, that iodine is taken up into the structure of the fruits and vegetables produced in that section. Furthermore, cows that feed upon grass, hay, and grain, grown in that section, yield milk with an unusually high content of iodine. This iodine is essential to health in human life, and especially in the prevention of the awful disease, goiter.

I believe that the massed millions in our great cities and industrial districts that must live each day from products put up in tin cans will demand from their local grocers fruits and vegetables, milk, butter, and cheese produced in the Piedmont section of South Carolina, because of its health-giving quality. This will give our products a market, and that market will ultimately prove far more profitable to our farmers than cotton is or ever will be.

Here is the letter, as published, to which I refer:

MARKETING-CENTER PLAN APPROVED BY CONGRESSMAN J. J. M'SWAIN

Declaring that he discerns great possibilities for the development of the country in the plans to establish farm-marketing centers, etc., in this section, Congressman JOHN J. MCSWAIN this week wrote to L. P. Slattery, of Greenville, of the emergency public-works board, offering his assistance.

Congressman MCSWAIN's letter to Mr. Slattery follows:

GREENVILLE, S.C., October 17, 1933.

Hon. L. P. SLATTERY,
Greenville, S.C.

DEAR MR. SLATTERY: I have observed with great interest the proposal which you have made to the emergency public-works board to establish a system of farm-marketing centers, including such units as creameries, canneries, farm-products exchange, cold storage, and other activities depending upon the local conditions.

I have studied the prospectus which you have prepared, and I am convinced that it holds great possibilities for the development not only of the agricultural sections of the country but also of the towns and cities which ultimately depend upon the prosperity of agriculture for their own prosperity.

I wish to report to you that I have discussed this matter privately, publicly, through the press, and at mass meetings in the counties composing the Fourth Congressional District, represented by me, and the idea has been received with great enthusiasm and almost unanimous approval. It is wellnigh axiomatic that no agricultural section can expect stable prosperity if it is dependent upon a one-crop system. That has been the trouble with the South for practically 100 years. That is why our agriculture is now impoverished almost to the point of extinction.

Your proposal will encourage and by necessary economic forces actually compel the farmers to adopt a rational system of diversification of crops. This will not only mean that the farmers will produce sufficient foodstuffs for domestic use and sufficient feedstuffs for the farm stock and cattle, but they will produce a surplus of these foodstuffs to sell and thus supplement the revenues from the farm. The trouble under existing conditions has been that whatever surplus the farmer produced was perishable and his cream soured, his fruits and vegetables rotted, and he could find no market for his eggs and chicks, and he could not sell at fair prices such commodities as nuts, peas, corn, hay, and similar feed crops. Under your plan, these grains and forage crops will be fed on the farm to cows, to the hogs, and to the chickens and thus in the form of milk and cream and in the form of meat, eggs, and poultry will be preserved for the food supply of the farmer and for the market of the neighboring cities and towns.

This is not only a pretty picture but is a realizable fact. I have studied farm marketing conditions in all parts of our Nation and in nearly every nation of Europe. Of course, Denmark is the outstanding and conspicuous example of success in the cooperative marketing of food products. But your plan is something more than a means of giving employment to people in construction of buildings during this emergency. Your plan contemplates a permanent system of agricultural economy, whereby the cotton produced in the South, and especially in the old, worn, and eroded lands of the South Atlantic States, will be produced at a clear profit and will constitute the lump cash crop, enabling the farmer to pay his taxes and interest on his debts and ultimately to pay the debts themselves. By your plan of agriculture, the fertilizer bill will immediately be greatly reduced, and will gradually be reduced until it will be practically eliminated. At present the fertilizer costs are almost prohibitive. Many farmers have told me this year that their fertilizer bills will equal the total cash value of their cotton crops. Thus the farmer has thrown in his land, the labor of himself and his family, the use of his farm implements, and his stock, and has absolutely nothing except a bare subsistence from garden and patches.

Your plan can work and will work, and should be authorized immediately, so that construction can begin and labor employed during the winter months and the farmers have advance notice of several months prior to the planting season next spring, so that they may plan to produce the fruits and vegetables, the eggs and chickens, and the cream and other commodities to find their way into the markets through your system of farm products market center.

I respectfully suggest that the business men of the towns and cities and the farmers be invited and, in fact, required to enter into a fair arrangement of mutual cooperation that will insure the success of the plan.

First, State corporations, either limited profit or nonprofit, or purely cooperative, should be organized to lease and to operate the plants. Operation by these corporations will insure their elimination from politics and the inefficiencies incidental to political control. Also these corporations should be required to enter into binding contracts for the payment of annual rental through the period of the lease of 20 or 30 or 40 years. This rental will take care of the investment by the Government and the depreciation. The operating corporation will be able to raise the money necessary to pay the rental from service charges and from profits made upon raw products purchased at prevailing prices and resold after being manufactured or worked, or treated and properly prepared and packed for the market, to be sold at prevailing market prices. Thus the farmer will be insured of the fair market price for the sale of any product any day in the year.

In this mutual arrangement between the business men of the towns and cities and the farmers there should be a solemn agreement, binding not only upon the conscience but legally binding and enforceable, whereby the farmer would produce the products necessary to keep the establishment active and operating at capacity, and the business men, particularly the wholesale and retail merchants, would bind themselves to buy from the operating corporation all dairy products, canned fruits and vegetables, meats and meat products, nuts and nut products, grains and grain products, forage and forage products that such merchants handle in their respectives lines of merchandise.

Thus, the proposition will be watertight from a business and investment point of view. It will meet the greatest economic and sociological need of the southeastern section. Our farmers are facing the crisis of quitting the farms and entering the industries or remaining on the lands as tenants and peasants. The one-crop system of cotton has wrought its terrible havoc. The farmers are unable to build and finance these farm products marketing centers for themselves, and are left hopeless in the clutches of cotton. The price of cotton oscillates and fluctuates up and down, and leaves the farmers suspended constantly between the upper stone of hope and the under stone of despair, and between the two he is being ground to destruction.

Furthermore, the business men of the cities and towns are now financially unable to construct these necessary farm products marketing centers. The business men have met destructive reverses. Their banks have failed, carrying double stock liability and wiping out their deposits. Dividends on all their corporate investments have practically ceased. The values of town and city real estate have dropped to the very bottom. At the same time property taxes have continued at the same high rate that prevailed during prosperous and booming times. Unless the city property owner pays his taxes he loses his property, and thus is wiped out forever. I know one business man who owns city property to the value of at least $150,000 and has an income even at present justifying that valuation. Yet this business man has been unable to borrow under any terms $28,000 on $150,000 worth of property. The property is not under mortgage, and all the taxes and insurance are paid, and he merely wishes the $28,000 to make a valuable extension to his plant at this time when construction is relatively low and when the employment of labor is so vital to the well-being of our people.

I hereby offer you my services to go to Washington with you and to appear before the Public Works Board or any member thereof in support of your plan. The farmers and business men of my district are enthusiastic for it and will be terribly disappointed if it fails to go through. The Government cannot stand a loss; the building will give employment, and operation of the plants will help to redeem the farmers of the Southeast. With all of these points in its favor, surely twenty or thirty million dollars can be set aside for this great project.

It will mean more to the cotton-cursed Southeastern States than the Tennessee Valley Authority will mean to the Tennessee Valley. It will mean more to our farmers than all the loans that have ever been made and ever will be made, when put together will amount to. It will mean more to our unemployed than double the amount necessary to build these houses and equip them if expended and distributed in a dole system.

It will mean far more to the country than the program of reforestation being carried on by the Civilian Conservation Corps.

If we can save the existing agricultural classes of the South, if we can keep them on the land and build up the land's fertility—stop erosion, stop soil robbing, stop the one-crop cotton system—stop the foreclosure of farm mortgages and start the farmers toward prosperity, start them in paying off mortgages, start them in improving their homes and buildings, start them in enriching their soils, start them in buying the products of industry distributed throughout the towns and cities, start them in building better country churches and better country schoolhouses, start them in building better roads on which to reach the markets, start them in singing a song of hope instead of weeping notes of despair, then we will be conferring a blessing upon humanity; and I respectfully submit that if this great program goes through, your name will be forever linked with the greatest program for the regeneration of agriculture and the salvation of the South Atlantic States.

Therefore, I hope with all my heart that you will not relax your efforts and interest in this program but will press it with zeal, enthusiasm, and determination, and I offer you my services and I believe that I can enlist for you the active cooperation of every Senator and of every Representative from the South Atlantic States.

With very kind personal regards, I am,

Yours truly,

J. J. MCSWAIN.

ADJUDICATION OF LIENS IN PUERTO RICO

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House Joint Resolution No. 344, to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution for the relief of Porto Rico", approved December 21, 1928, to permit an adjudication with respect to liens of the United States arising by virtue of loans under such joint resolution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution for the relief of Puerto Rico", approved December 21, 1928, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new section reading as follows:

"SEC. 7. (a) Upon the conditions herein prescribed for the protection of the United States, the consent of the United States is given, to be named a party in any suit which is now pending or which may hereafter be brought in any of the insular courts of the island of Puerto Rico by the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore, or the Land Bank Commissioner acting pursuant to part 3 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation acting pursuant to the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation Act, for the foreclosure of any mortgage or other lien upon real estate for the purpose of securing an adjudication touching any junior mortgage or other junior lien the United States may have or claim by virtue of loans made pursuant to the provisions of this joint resolution. Service upon the United States shall be made by serving the process of the court with a copy of the bill of complaint upon the United States attorney for the district or division in which the suit has been or may be brought and by sending copies of the process and bill, by registered mail, to the Attorney General of the United States at Washington, D.C. The United States shall have 60 days after service as above provided, or such further time as the court may allow, within which to appear and answer, plead, or demur. Any such suit brought against the United States in any insular court may be removed by the United States to the United States district court for the district in which the suit may be pending. The removal shall be effected in the manner prescribed by section 29 of the Judicial Code (U.S.C., title 28, sec. 72): Provided, That the petition for removal may be filed at any time before the expiration of 30 days after the time herein or by the court allowed by the United States to answer, and no removal bond shall be required. The court to which the cause is removed may, before judgment, remand it to the insular court if it shall appear that there is no real dispute respecting the rights of the United States, or all the other parties shall concede of record the claims of the United States. Except as herein otherwise provided, a judicial sale made in pursuance of a judgment in such a suit shall have the same effect respecting the discharge of the property from liens and encumbrances held by the United States as may be provided with respect to such matters by the law of Puerto Rico and in which island the land is situated: Provided, That a sale to satisfy a lien inferior to one of the United States shall be made subject to and without disturbing the lien of the United States, unless the United States, by its attorneys, consents that the property may be sold free of its mortgage or lien and the proceeds divided as the parties may be entitled. In any case where the debt to the United States is due, the United States may ask, by way of affirmative relief, for the foreclosure of its own lien or mortgage and in any case where the property is sold to satisfy a first mortgage or first lien held by the United States, the United States may bid at the sale such sum not exceeding the amount of its claim with expenses of sale, as may be directed by the chief of the department, bureau, or other agency of the Government which has charge of the administration of the laws in respect of which the claim of the United States arises. No judgment for costs or other money judgment shall be rendered against the United States in any suit or proceeding which may be instituted under the provisions of this section. Nor shall the United States be or become liable for the payment of the costs of any such suit or proceeding or any part thereof: Provided, That if the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore, or the Land Bank Commissioner and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation acquire the property involved in the proceedings in which the United States was made a party under the provisions of this section, any amount the bank or the Land Bank Commissioner and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation may receive upon the ultimate disposition of the property, exceeding the amount of its investment, but not to exceed the amount of the Commission's lien, shall be paid by the said bank in its own behalf or in behalf of the Land Bank Commissioner and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation to the Puerto Rican Hurricane Relief Commission.

"(b) The Hurricane Relief Commission is hereby authorized to waive any priorities it may have or claim over liens in favor of the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore, such priorities arising out of reamortization agreements entered into between the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore and its borrowers who are also indebted to the Commission.

"(c) If the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore, or the Land Bank Commissioner and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation acquire or deem it necessary to acquire by foreclosure proceedings any real or personal property in Puerto Rico by virtue of a lien upon the said referred property duly filed of record in the jurisdiction in which the same is located, and a junior lien in favor of the United States attached to such property by virtue of loans made pursuant to the provisions of this joint resolution the said banking institution may make a written request to the Puerto Rican Hurricane Relief Commission to have the same extinguished. If after appropriate investigation, it appears to such Commission that the proceeds from the sale of the property would be insufficient to satisfy in whole or in part, the lien of the United States, or that the claim of the United States has been satisfied or by lapse of time or otherwise has become unenforceable, such Commission shall so report to the Comptroller General, who thereupon may authorize it to issue a certificate of release, which shall operate to release the property from such lien: Provided, That any amount that may be realized by the said bank or by the Land Bank Commissioner and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation in the ultimate sale of this property, over and above its investment, but not to exceed the amount of the Commission's lien, shall be paid by the bank in its own behalf or in behalf of the Land Bank Commissioner and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation to the Puerto Rican Hurricane Relief Commission."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, this bill was suggested by Governor Meyers of the Farm Credit Administration in order to cure a situation in the Island of Puerto Rico in which the Federal Government has loaned through the Federal Land Bank in Baltimore and the Puerto Rican Relief Commission certain sums of money.

The Federal land bank, prior to 1928, made many loans in the island of Puerto Rico. During the year 1928, as the House will recall, Puerto Rico was visited by an unprecedented storm, whereupon the Congress established what is known as the "Puerto Rican Relief Commission." This Commission, due to the extremities existing in the island, made loans for which second liens or second mortgages were taken on property which was at the time under a first lien to the land bank. We have had two agencies of the United States Government in Puerto Rico lending money in an effort to rehabilitate the inhabitants of that island.

It so happened that the Graham Act of 1931, which was passed following a second hurricane, gave consent to the adjudication of liens in State courts and in the United States district courts but did not in its terms consent to such adjudications in the insular courts of Puerto Rico. The right to adjudicate liens of the United States is now questioned and dependent on the outcome of appellate proceedings, which may not be concluded for many months. The result is we are experiencing in the island considerable difficulty in enforcing the first lien or in clearing titles, because the insular courts do not have the authority to make the United States Government or the Puerto Rican Relief Commission a party to foreclosure proceedings. This hinders new loans by the Federal land bank, and the psychological effect is bad. The right of the United States district court in Puerto Rico when the amount is less than $3,000 is also subject to serious technical objection.

This legislation is designed to make more secure the United States Government or the Public Treasury and to permit reamortization in instances where those in authority deem it wise. In some instances we are told that a few of those able to pay have refused to pay because of the legal or peculiar technical difficulties involved. This is designed to clear up this situation and to protect the Public Treasury.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not a fact that this measure amends the procedural law of Puerto Rico in order to give the insular courts jurisdiction over the United States and the Farm Credit Administration in cases involving foreclosures where the Farm Credit Administration or the Hurricane Relief Commission has a second lien?

The Graham Act permitted jurisdiction to be acquired over the United States in the United States but not in our insular possessions; and in numerous instances, as our chairman stated, some of the mortgagors who are able to pay refused to pay because they recognize that under existing law no foreclosure is permissible because no one has authority to enter the appearance of the Federal Government, and there is no procedure prescribed by which the Federal Government can be served with process and brought into court so that the decree of foreclosure will foreclose and conclude the rights of all parties in interest.

May I add that realizing this condition exists, on some of these plantations the trees are being cut down, removed, and sold, thereby depreciating the value of the security, because they realize that no process is possible to bring about a foreclosure of the mortgage and a conclusive adjudication of the rights and interests of all the parties involved.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. How many agencies have we making loans down there as the present time?

Mr. McDUFFIE. There is only one, the Farm Credit Administration.

Mr. SNELL. How much money have we at stake that this legislation will affect?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I regret I cannot accurately inform the gentleman. I am informed we have loaned about $6,000,000 in the islands. Perhaps the gentleman from Maine can give us that information.

Mr. BEEDY. I have not the figures.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, this proposed legislation is for the benefit of the United States?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes. I think there are about 1,400 loans by the Relief Commission, on which second liens were taken, ranging in amount from a somewhat nominal sum of $250 or $500 up to $5,000 or more.

Mr. SNELL. Are we likely to get a fair amount of this money back, or does the gentleman know?

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman knows as much about that as I do. We are hopeful we can get a reasonable amount of it returned and this legislation will be helpful in our efforts to bring about that result.

Mr. BEEDY. I wish the gentleman would turn to page 5 of the bill, paragraph (b), and explain to the House for what purpose this paragraph is put in the bill. I do not recall the paragraph or any reference to it in committee. The paragraph reads:

(b) The Hurricane Relief Commission is hereby authorized to waive any priorities it may have or claim over liens in favor of the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore, such priorities arising out of reamortization agreements entered into between the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore and its borrowers who are also indebted to the Commission.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman will recall that the attorney for the Federal land bank or the Farm Corporation appeared before the committee, as well as Major Landreth, of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, and explained, if I remember correctly, there were certain instances where reamortization or the making of a new loan under different conditions will be necessary, and feasible, in which the Puerto Rican Relief Commission has a first or second lien, and this is to authorize them, as I understand it, to waive their rights, in an effort to bring about such reamortization.

Mr. BEEDY. This language provides that they waive any priorities in favor of the land banks.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes. Suppose they had a first lien and the owner of the property desired to secure a new loan—not through the Puerto Rican Relief Commission, because they are lending no more money, as the gentleman knows, but through the Federal land bank. It is feared they have no authority to do this under the present law. This language, I take it, is designed to give the Commission authority to waive their rights in favor of the Federal land bank which will take over the entire indebtedness.

Mr. BEEDY. What is concerning me is that this money that the Relief Commission may lend is reappropriated for that express purpose.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. If we authorize them under this paragraph to give up their priorities in favor of the land banks, how is the United States protected?

Mr. McDUFFIE. If they were giving up these priorities to some agency other than a Government agency, I think the gentleman would be correct, but, after all, it is Uncle Sam's money, it matters not which agency extended the loan.

Mr. BEEDY. The theory is that there has probably been more money lent on some of these properties than they will ever get out of them?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BEEDY. And therefore in order to effect a first claim in favor of a Federal agency, namely, the Federal land bank, and provide for the reamortization which seems desirable, this language is thought desirable?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

If there are no further questions, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PUBLIC MONEYS OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS DEPOSITED IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 9280) relating to deposits in the United States of public moneys of the government of the Philippine Islands.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept, upon such terms and conditions as he may from time to time prescribe, deposits of public moneys of the government of the Philippine Islands and to pay out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, interest on any or all of such deposits, other than demand deposits, at such rate or rates, not in excess of 2 percent per annum, as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not care about a second, but I think the gentleman should explain this bill somewhat.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

By unanimous consent, a second was considered as ordered.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, this legislation was deemed necessary by those occupying the position of a trustee or a quasi-trustee of the funds of the dependent government of the Philippine Islands.

As I understand it, the funds of the government are now deposited in 46 banks throughout the country—not funds of individuals, not funds of organizations within the government, but funds of the Philippine government. The necessity for such legislation was not deemed necessary until the Supreme Court rendered its decision in the case of City of Marion, Ill., against Ben Sneeden, Receiver.

The various banks have heretofore set aside a part of their assets to make these funds secure.

The Court has held that the funds of a State or subdivision must be treated as funds of all other depositors in the event of the insolvency of the bank, and no preference could be given these special deposits.

So far as is known there is only one instance of an insolvent bank where these funds are deposited. This bill is designed to give the depositor of these funds the right to put them in the United States Treasury and to authorize the Treasury to receive them and pay maximum rate of 2 percent interest. The interest rate may be for a less amount and cannot be for any more. This is the amount now paid. It may never be necessary to remove the funds from their present depositories. This is only a safeguard, and the only ground for this legislation is that we are in a manner the guardian of these funds, and should take every precaution to make them secure.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Why are we responsible for the Philippine bonds?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Because they have to be placed in this country, as the result of an understanding between the two Governments, especially their reserve fund. They must keep them on deposit in this country.

Mr. SNELL. We are not doing it for any other country?

Mr. McDUFFIE. No; no other country has a reserve fund deposited with us.

Mr. SNELL. Do they have any larger rate of interest than is paid by commercial banks?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Not at all. The Secretary of the Treasury may refuse to take them at 2 percent; it is discretionary with him as to the interest he will allow, up to 2 percent.

Mr. SNELL. Is anyone else allowed to deposit funds in the United States?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Only trust funds—like the Indian trust funds and postal deposits.

Mr. SNELL. This is a trust fund set up by the Government?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is it exactly; that is to say, we are treating these deposits as trust funds. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT OF JUNE 3, 1916

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2041) to amend the act of June 15, 1933, amending the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 37 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, further amended by inserting after the words "United States", in the seventh sentence of said section, the words "or of the Philippine Islands."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF DISTILLERIES AND RECTIFIERS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H.R. 9617) to authorize the reduction of the required distance between liquor distilleries and rectifying plants, and to authorize higher fences around distilleries. I understand it is a noncontroversial bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3266 of the Revised Statutes (relating to premises on which the distilling of liquor is prohibited) (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1170) is amended by inserting after the word "rectifying" a comma and the following: "except that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to permit such use for distilling on premises at such lesser distance than 600 feet as he prescribes, in any case in which he deems that such permission may be granted without danger to the revenue".

SEC. 2. Section 3280 of the Revised Statutes (relating to minimum distance between places where businesses of distilling and rectifying may be carried on, and to conditions precedent to carrying on distilling business) (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1183) is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: "except that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to permit such business of distilling or process of distillation to be carried on at such lesser distance than 600 feet as he prescribes, in any case in which he deems that such permission may be granted without danger to the revenue".

SEC. 3. Section 3275 of the Revised Statutes (relating to keeping distilleries accessible) (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1177) is amended by striking out the period at the end of the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "but the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the construction and maintenance of a fence or wall of such greater height than 5 feet as he shall prescribe in any case in which in his opinion such higher fence or wall is necessary to give adequate protection from trespassers."

With the following committee amendments:

On page 2, after line 12, insert the following:

"SEC. 3. So much of section 3244 'third' of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1830), as reads 'no officer shall collect any special tax for rectifying distilled spirits on any premises less than 600 feet in a direct line from any distillery' is amended to read as follows: 'no officer shall collect any special tax for rectifying distilled spirits on any premises less than 600 feet (or less than the distance permitted by the Secretary of the Treasury in the particular case) in a direct line from any distillery.'"

On page 2, line 13, strike out "Sec. 3" and insert "Sec. 4."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. LAWRENCE RIVER, OGDENSBURG, N.Y.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H.R. 9584) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute therefor the bill (S. 3641) of similar title, a similar bill, and to consider that bill at this time. This has the approval of all of the departments in Washington.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the Senate bill?

There was no objection, and the Clerk read the Senate bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y., authorized to be built by the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission by an act of Congress approved June 14, 1933, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 14, 1934.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 9584) was laid on the table.

REGISTRY OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill, S. 2692, relating to the record of registry of certain aliens, as amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this may not be strictly a parliamentary inquiry, but I should like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] whether he would agree to an amendment to this bill. If he does agree to the amendment which I have in mind, I think we can effect the successful passage of the bill without opposition. If he does not, we shall have to oppose it to the best of our ability. The amendment I have in mind is to strike out that which appears in italics and is as follows, "or, (b) who was in the United States as a bona fide political or religious refugee." This would leave the bill as it was first introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON]. In other words, I mean to strike out the italicized language in the bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Does the gentleman oppose the amendment that I offered, to change the date of January 1, 1933, to July 1, 1933?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. My principal objection is to confusing the question of granting favors to a few hundred Russians whose lives may be at stake with a far-reaching question of who might be political or religious refugees. That may involve the Nazi and any other group or individual. This bill was introduced originally for the benefit of what we call the "White Russians." We are not opposed to granting them some consideration, but personally I think the privilege which they seek could be granted better in another way. If we are going to add to the Russian question the other proposition, it will complicate the matter and we will have to object, and we will oppose the bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand what the gentleman means.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I mean what I say, and I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I object. I shall have to proceed in an orderly way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 2692, as amended, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to supplement the naturalization laws, and for other purposes", approved March 2, 1929, is amended by adding to the end thereof the following:

"Upon application filed with the Commissioner General of Immigration within 1 year after the approval of this act such registry may also be made as to any alien not ineligible to citizenship who entered the United States prior to July 1, 1933, in whose case there is no record of admission for permanent residence and (a) who prior to that date could not be deported to any country to which it was lawful to deport him, and (b) who was in the United States as a bona fide political or religious refugee, if such alien shall make a satisfactory showing to the Commissioner General of Immigration, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, that he—

"(1) Has not been out of the United States since entry;

"(2) Is a person of good moral character;

"(3) Is not subject to deportation under any law other than the Immigration Act of 1924; and

"(4) Did not, before July 1, 1933, withhold from the immigration authorities of the United States necessary information concerning his personal history sought in connection with their application to the authorities of any foreign country for permission to deport him thereto."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Ohio to 20 minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not do anything except to enable a number of Russian refugees who are in this country, to adjust their status under our immigration laws through registration under the act of March 2, 1929. Some of them have been here since 1917, some since 1920, some since 1922, and some since 1924. All of these people who are here, several hundreds of them, could not be deported to Russia, because we did not recognize Russia until several months ago. Technically these people are subject to deportation. Ninety-five percent of these aliens are of a high type and are good prospective citizens. In most cases the men have married American women and have American children. We cannot find a record of their entry in the last number of years. Some of them came here as visitors and failed to depart. They would be subject to deportation unless we give some statutory right to the Secretary of Labor to permit these people to remain in the United States. To permit them to remain in the United States, as provided in the bill, they must meet the following conditions: First, they must have entered the United States prior to January 1933. Second, they could not have been deported to any country to which it was unlawful to deport them prior to July 1, 1933. In other words, this applies only to this group of Russians, because Russia was the only country to which we could not deport an alien. Third, they must not have been out of the United States. In other words, the alien must have continuously resided in the United States from the time of his entry. Fourth, they must not have withheld from the immigration authorities of the United States information concerning their personal history sought in connection with the deportation proceedings; that is, they must have been people of good moral character and must not have committed any crime.

This bill permits these men and women who were born in Russia and who have been in this country, 10, 12, and 14 years, who were not subject to deportation, to remain here. The purpose of the law is to permit them to make application for registry and carry out and prove the necessary requirements I have indicatcd to you, provided they are morally and physically fit. And, as I said a moment ago, in 95 percent of the cases, many of which have been presented to the committee, were found to be all fine specimens of manhood, people who speak the English language perfectly. Some of them are professors in our colleges, some of them in our universities, some of them experts in airplanes and some of them are in our Coast Guard. In their families, they have from one to four children. It would be inhuman to take these men and deport them and separate them from their families. This bill does not open the immigration law. It does not change the act of 1924. It simply does a humane thing to a number of people who are qualified for prospective citizenship.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mrs. KAHN. Is it not a fact that most of these men are what are known as "White Russians", and if returned to Russia they will probably be shot? They are political refugees?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is true. Most of these men who are here today, who have been with us and who have intermarried with our American families, are men of high type, who left Russia a number of years ago. If they were deported, in a number of cases, the death penalty would be executed.

Mrs. KAHN. Many of them were officers in what was known as the "White Army"?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is true.

Mrs. KAHN. And they would be subject to the death penalty if they returned?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman explain the attitude of the White Russian with regard to the political organization of government?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. These aliens were absolutely opposed to communism. They are of the finest element of Russia. They are what we call the aristocracy of Russia. They came from the better quarters.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. There was before the gentleman's committee during this session a bill which sought to change this date to 1924, so that an alien who could not be deported could apply for citizenship.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That does not apply here at all.

Mr. BLANCHARD. May I ask the gentleman whether or not he expects to report that bill out?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That bill has been reported out, and I hope the Rules Committee will give me some action soon.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. FOCHT. This bill, I understand, is sponsored by the Department of Labor?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. And also the Department of State?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. And they both made thorough investigations?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is true. The Department of State and the Department of Labor have collaborated with our good colleague, Mr. BACON, on the Republican side, and this bill was the result of many months' conference and investigation of all these aliens. I assure the gentlemen that this is a very fine bill.

Mr. SCHULTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. SCHULTE. There are not very many who will be affected by this, are there?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; just a few hundred. They are married to our American women. They have American children.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I hope there will be no objection to this, because I had some experience myself before leaving California. Some of my Russian friends, who are high-class Russians, said that if we recognized Russia they would have to go back to the detention camps in Russia.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What is this matter which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] has been talking about? His objection should be explained. The bill as amended is not available. If the gentleman from Ohio is correct, there should be a further amendment.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not understand what the gentleman has reference to.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Your view is this bill only applies to aliens who were in the United States before July 1, 1933? In fact, it seeks to reach those who were caught here in 1914, have been here continuously since, and are now men without a country. The Department, I understand, seeks this legislation for protective purposes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It only applies to those who were here before July 1, 1933. It has nothing to do with Nazis or Germans.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. And how many people does it affect?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Four or five hundred. Both Departments have agreed to it. They came before our committee and asked for this legislation.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This does not change the status of these Russians and give them preference over other aliens. I am anxious to have this question cleared up.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; it does not.

The Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Carr, testified before the committee when the bill was up for a hearing. He considered the proposed bill a humane measure and not calculated to open the doors to further immigration but to enable a certain small group of people to have their status corrected so as to enable them to remain in the United States. The number is very small, and the State Department has no objection to the bill at all.

The number of people involved as given by Commissioner McCormack is approximately 1,000, but this figure is only an estimate and includes 1,000 Russians against whom warrants of deportation have already been issued. Commissioner McCormack estimated that in addition to the 1,000 deportation cases there are not more than 3,000, up to about 4,000, persons from Russian territory who are subject to deportation. About half of them came here illegally; the others were here temporarily. The only reason why no legislation was heretofore passed in these cases is that the number of people involved is small, but it is the opinion of Commissioner McCormack that while the number is small the cases are deserving of consideration.

As to the type of people who are involved in the legislation, Mrs. Courtney Campbell, who is a daughter of Judge Green and who for some time acted as a special immigration investigator under section 24 of the immigration law, said that the class of individuals covered by this legislation has a very high percentage of extremely gifted persons. There is a professor of ancient history at Yale University; a professor of sociology at Harvard; a research assistant at Yale; an inventor of television at the Westinghouse Electric Co.; an inventor of synthetic rubber; another professor of history at the University of California; a professor of economics; the noted pianist and composer Serge Rachmaninoff; a soil expert at the Department of Agriculture; an aviator who won the world's altitude record in 1931; Dr. Strachofsky, who is a professor of modern European history at Georgetown; and so forth.

The manner in which these refugees came varies—some came on valid visas and passports, but their passports having expired they are now here technically subject to deportation. Others are students in higher institutions of learning whose status as students has changed and who are therefore also liable to deportation. Most of the men are married and some of them have American-born children.

In addition to the high occupations which were mentioned, there are others who work as manual laborers, some artists, others writers, and so forth.

Most of the men entered this country between 1921 and 1926. Some of them arrived with valid visas for 6 months and others came as members of ships' crews, and there is a whole group of army and navy officers who landed forcibly in San Francisco Harbor, having fled from the Bolshevik terror in the Far East. Most of the Russians unlawfully here range in age from 35 to 50. There are practically no very old men and only a few men are under the age of 25. There was an interesting thing brought to the attention of th ecommittee, to wit: In the National Guard, Two Hundred and Forty-fourth Coast Artillery, there is a group known as the "Russian Battery." This battery consists of 38 members of whom 30 are technically subject to deportation. Most of them served in the former Russian Army or Navy and are now serving as buck privates in the National Guard. This battery has been in existence 5 years and received in 1930 a prize from the War Department for having the highest discipline and morale in the whole State of New York.

Miss Eastman, a worker for the alien branch of the Young Women's Christian Association, testified before the committee about several cases of hardship that came to her attention, one being the case of a Russian woman, named Helen Haritonoff, who is a widow, her husband having been killed in the Russian Army at the beginning of the World War. Two of her brothers perished during the civil war in Russia and her parents died of starvation during the revolution. She herself escaped with her life during the anti-Bolshevik revolts of 1921–22; and after walking for several miles across ice to Finland, she picked up two of her nieces, the daughters of her brothers who perished during the civil war. After placing them in a school in Belgium, she came to this country to continue her medical studies and to support her nieces. She arrived in 1925 as a medical student. She could not obtain employment as a nurse because of her lack of American citizenship, and she is in constant fear of being taken into custody and deported. This is a typical case. Miss Eastman has come in contact with 70 cases of like character.

In conclusion let me emphasize that this bill of itself does not grant citizenship to any alien, nor does it of itself initiate any procedure toward citizenship under our naturalization laws. It does, however, enable the beneficiaries of its provisions to secure a status under our immigration laws upon which it will be possible for them to initiate, in their own behalf, the regular procedure under our naturalization laws, later to become citizens. None of the beneficiaries of this bill would acquire any other status than that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill. I think it is a just measure. I introduced the original bill on this subject. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I should like to give him some of the early history of this bill. This bill was drawn by experts from the Departments of State and Labor and has their support. It was originally introduced in behalf of what is known as "White Russian refugees", of whom there are a very few in this country, who could not and cannot be deported to any other country. They were and are in this country. We cannot possibly deport them. They came in as a result of the Russian revolution. There are very few of them. They have proved themselves good and law-abiding residents. They are, however men without a country. Unless this bill passes, they cannot be naturalized, though they will be here as long as they live. Many of them have married American women. Many of them have American children. As a measure of justice, this bill simply allows them to register, so that they may eventually become citizens, providing they can prove by witnesses that they are law-abiding persons of good moral character.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman says there are a few. Will the gentleman give us some idea what that means?

Mr. BACON. I understand the testimony before the committee showed five or six hundred.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is sure that will cover the entire number?

Mr. BACON. It only applies to people who came into this country prior to July 1, 1933, and who could not be deported.

Mr. SNELL. Well, now, just what does that mean?

Mr. BACON. It means that there was no country to which they could be deported. For example, we did not have any diplomatic relations with Russia until recently. Therefore, the White Russians in this country could not be deported to Russia.

Mr. SNELL. And now they could be deported?

Mr. BACON. We could, if we wanted to, in which case they would be sent to Siberia or to immediate slaughter on arrival. The gentleman knows very well that they would not last a month.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I think this covers cases such as one called to my attention. A doctor, an outstanding specialist, who had a large sanitorium abroad, came to this country to study our methods of treating tuberculosis. He was caught here when the World War broke out. He came on a passport, issued by the Russian Government, as a visitor. He has repeatedly presented himself to the immigration authorities, but they have told him "We cannot send you to any country." I understand it costs the Government considerable to carry continually these aliens, about 400, in their present status.

Mr. BACON. That is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. We broke off relations with the Russian Government before that passport expired and there was no way by which that doctor could go back to Russia. As a result, he is here today.

Mr. BACON. He cannot be deported.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. He cannot leave this country because he cannot secure a passport from any country. For 20 years he has lived here and every 6 months reports to the immigration authorities.

Mr. BACON. That is quite right. I know of some cases where Russians are in this country on old Imperial passports. A great many more are here on what are known as "Nansen League of Nations travel certificates." They are people without a country unless we take them in and allow them to become citizens.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman of the committee said there were about 400 of them. The gentleman from New York says there are between 500 and 600. Is this about the maximum number?

Mr. BACON. I think that will cover them.

Mr. BLANTON. These people are here; we cannot get rid of them; we cannot send them back anywhere. This bill permits them to become citizens and to assume the responsibilties of citizenship; does it not?

Mr. BACON. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what should be done. Every person of good character in the United States today should become a citizen and share the burdens and responsibilities of citizenship.

Mr. BACON. Absolutely. The gentleman knows that I was on the Immigration Committee many years. Ten years ago I helped write the Johnson restricted immigration bill. There is not a Member in the House who has voted more consistently for restricting immigration to our country than I have. This bill does not allow a single additional person to come into this country. This bill does not disturb or touch in any way our immigration laws.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. As I understood the chairman of the committee, he said that these people constituted the aristocracy of Russia. Did the gentleman mean the aristocracy of the royal family or the aristocracy of wealth in Russia?

Mr. BACON. Neither. These people are mostly in straitened circumstances, and all have to work hard for their daily bread. Most of them have an excellent education, far above the average, and all are law-abiding and self-respecting people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute. I wish to answer the gentleman from Ohio.

Mrs. KAHN. They represent the aristocracy of brains.

Mr. TRUAX. One other question, if the gentleman will permit: What I wanted to know was whether they were members of the royalist aristocracy or the aristocracy of wealth. Would that give them preferred treatment over other Russian citizens in this country?

Mr. BACON. I would say that these people do not fall in either of those categories; and there is no question of preferred status to anybody affected by this bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. To answer specifically the gentleman from Ohio, when I said "aristocracy", I meant the fine business people. It had nothing whatever to do with the Czar or with the royalist classes.

Mr. TRUAX. I am glad to have this information, because in this country we have an aristocracy of wealth, although that is about the only aristocracy I know of.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very important one. I refer to the bill S. 2692. If you have before you a bill with that number, but not numbered calendar 760, then you have not the right bill, and I dare say that 0.9 of the Members present have the wrong bill in their hands. Unless you have that bill, you will not see the amendment to which I referred.

Let us not make any mistake about this bill. I do not know a Member of the House who is opposed to this White Russian project. I am not opposed to it. I think the matter should be handled by an amendment to the deportation laws. The bill without this amendment would be the same as the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON]. When the committee sought to amend his bill, he refused to father it any further. This amendment concerning the political and religious refugees has absolutely nothing to do with White Russians. The bill under consideration is supposed to deal with White Russians. When we say "White Rusians", we mean white as contrasted with red, not white from the Caucasian standpoint, but white in that they are not affiliated with the Russian Reds. I think you understand what I mean. Do not be under any misapprehension about the Senate bill. I do not think that it represents the feeling of the House committee.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I have not time to yield now.

Mr. Speaker, may I say to the restrictionists not to be carried off their feet and vote for the bill as amended by the Senate. Let us strike out this amendment and enact the so-called "White Russian bill."

I shall read the language of the amendment. It reads, "or who was in the United States as a bona fide political or religious refugee."

Now, this opens up a field that is interminable. Talk about political and religious refugees. Ask the question, Who or what is a political or religious refugee? To find the answer to this question, we might be required to solve complicated and serious situations.

Anybody who might come here surrepticiously might claim that he is a political refugee, and he thereby would come within the provisions of the bill. Anyone who could steal his way into the country and could successfully claim to be a refugee would be entitled to the priceless heritage of American citizenship. To pass such legislation today is not wise. If you want to take care of the White Russians who are here, that is all right. They are here and they do not want to be sent back to Russia because they claim to be afraid of execution. While most of this is propaganda, I do not want to send them back for fear that there are a few meritorious cases. I do not know of anybody who wants to send them back if they are in serious danger. Let them stay here; they have been here ever since the World War. If we want to reach them, the proper way to do it would be to amend the deportation law to exempt from deportation certain individuals under certain conditions, making the exemption fit the case of these White Russians.

Mr. BLANTON raised the question that this compels them to become citizens. It does not have this effect at all. They may elect whether they become citizens. This section that has been added is full of dynamite. It is un-American and it is inconsistent with what we have been doing here for years.

What is the hurry? If you vote this down today, it may come up some other time. No one wants to send these fellows back to Russia, and there is no inclination that I know of on the part of any department to send them back. We have allowed them to stay here 15 years, and we can certainly allow them to stay for another session of Congress.

It is this last sentence in italics that will open the door to all political refugees. I am not opposed to any group particularly, but may I say that from the standpoint of statesmanship on our part we should not establish this precedent. Are we going to open up this great possibility? Are we going to allow the precedent of letting in certain religious refugees and giving them privilege of citizenship? Someone said that this amendment goes back to 1933, but the language I referred to does not go back to 1933 and would affect only White Russians, and I will prove it to you. I asked for an amendment to be inserted striking out the word "or" and inserting the word "and" in lieu thereof. If you would change this word to "and" it would probably be susceptible of an interpretation that it referred only to White Russians.

Now, there are two classifications, one being the White Russians and the other these religious and political refugees.

Mr. BEEDY. The limitation of July 1 applies to the first class and the italic to another class?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman has it absolutely right. I am very much in earnest about this matter. I am not a member of the Immigration Committee, and I do not desire to thrust myself into this matter in an unseemly manner, but I hope we do not make a mistake.

Let us vote like we have voted here as Democrats and Republicans for many years on these immigration questions. Let us keep up the bars. Immigration is not a political issue. The Republicans have no right to claim that they are restrictionists to the exclusion of the Democrats. In every vote we have had on this question in 10 years I have been here there have been striking majorities on both sides of the aisle. Do not make a mistake today. Let us vote this down and let us bring up the White Russian bill by itself. Let us give them an opportunity and fix it so they shall not be sent back through deportation or give them citizenship if that is your wish. I would not do it that way; and if you want to do it that way, let ur do it in that manner and do it right.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have both bills, S. 2692 and H.R. 8850. The House bill was introduced before the Senate bill was introduced, according to the date. The House bill contains the provision that the gentleman is speaking of. As I read it, if aliens cannot prove they were not in this country prior to July 1, 1933, nothing can be done for them. As I read the language here, it does not allow anyone to enter this country. If it does, the committee should agree to an amendment.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No; it does not, on its face, leave anyone come into this country, but it gives rights to citizenship to anyone who can claim any kind of religious or political persecution as his reason for being here.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Like the gentleman from Ohio, I do not want to open up the doors to everybody when millions of our people are out of work. As I understand the bill, it only applies to the aliens now here.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Here is what the bill does. Anybody can sneak across the border, and they may come from many different countries. If he is caught he will claim he is a religious refugee. Then you cannot send him out. He has a right to become a citizen by stealing his way into this country. He might be the meanest individual in the world. He might have all sorts of crimes attached to his reputation. You have opened the door by this bill. Why open the door today? What is the hurry?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman should suggest his amendment and the chairman of the committee should accept it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I offered my amendment at the outset but it was rejected, and now we will beat the whole bill just because of refusal to amend. If you were to substitute the word "and" for the word "or", it would accomplish that purpose.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. As I understand this bill, a White Russian is one who is of the Royalist Party.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not know what he is or was. They call them White Russians.

Mr. TRUAX. The Government that we have recognized, which has a legation here, is known as "Red Russia." Are they in favor of this legislation? May this not be an effrontery to them?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not know what this Red Russian outfit that the gentleman refers to thinks of this bill. If they oppose it and are anxious to have these refugees sent back so they may shoot them or send them to Siberia, I should think that this would be proof that the gentleman's Democratic President made a mistake in establishing diplomatic relations with such a cruel and bloodthirsty bunch of Communists.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it the gentleman's opinion that this is a bad bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. TRUAX. And the gentleman is of the opinion that it ought to be defeated?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. What the gentleman means is that we should not take hasty action on this section on account of a possible question in reference to interpretation.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes. If they would agree to the amendment, I would not object.

Mr. BEEDY. If the word "and" is substituted for the word "or", would that take care of the gentleman's objection?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the word "and" is put in place of the word "or", will that satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes. Although I still think this is not the best way to handle it, so far as I am concerned, I would be willing to adopt the bill with that change.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Would the gentleman be satisfied if I offered an amendment to that effect?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Where would this amendment go?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Line 3, page 2.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on page 2, line 3, after the word "him" the word "or" may be stricken out and insert in lieu thereof the word "and."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEEDY. I understand that amendment is offered to the bill S. 2692?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is correct.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield? I wonder if this bill will permit the three Russian princes, one of whom married Barbara Hutton, to remain in this country?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not know; I am not informed with reference to them. I am interested in opposing entrance into this uncertain broad field of religious and political refugees. Let us keep up the bars. I am glad that the Membership has agreed with me and have received my views so kindly. I appreciate this and hope that the bill will work out to the advantage of that small group of White Russians who are in fact in some danger, but that it will not result in any cheapening of the methods by which aliens can procure the proudest privilege which any man can enjoy—American citizenship. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, these people are already in the United States. They are not now assuming any responsibilities as citizens of the United States. If they stay here, I want them to assume such responsibilities along with the rest of us.

The bill provides that they must have been in the United States continuously since entry. They must be persons of good character. They must not be subject to deportation under any law other than the Immigration Act of 1924.

This is a bill that gets after the Bolsheviks of the country. This is a bill not in favor of the kind of aristocracy that is bothering my friend from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] in his political campaign in Ohio. It is a bill to run the Reds out of the United States and keep the "white people" in, and by "white people" is meant those people who are not Reds, but people who believe in orderly government, people who believe that the Government of the United States ought to be run according to a constitution and not according to anarchy and force and under a red flag. That appeals to me.

Here are some of the people whom this bill affects, and let me read their standing:

A professor of ancient history at Yale University, a professor of sociology at Harvard, a research assistant at Yale, an inventor of television at Westinghouse Electric Co., an inventor of synthetic rubber, a professor of history at the University of California, a professor of economics, a noted pianist and composer, a soil expert now in the Department of Agriculture, a distinguished aviator who won the world's altitude record in 1931, a professor of modern European history at Georgetown University here in Washington.

Are these men the kind of aristocracy that is bugging up in somebody's head just now? [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now; I am sorry.

It is a bill for Americanism and again bolshevism. It is a bill for lovers of constitutional government instead of Russian Bolsheviks, and this is why I am for it.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. TRUAX. I believe the gentleman said there is a soil expert here that would be let in. I should like to send all the soil experts down in the Department of Agriculture back to Russia. They are ruining the American farmer.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of that part of this legislation that pertains to the White Russians in the United States. They should be given the benefit of this legislation. They are good citizens. They believe in our form of government and they are sustaining advocates of constitutional government as now carried on in the United States.

The matter that was bothering me was the establishment of a new principle that was proposed here to let into the United States political and religious refugees, and that is what this measure would have done had not the Senate bill as proposed by the chairman of the committee been amended by striking out the word "or" and substituting the word "and", and I am assuming, of course, that this is going to correct this bill and not tack on to this bill something of a very different nature. I believe it will have this effect, and with this amendment adopted I am in favor of the bill.

However, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that before the bill was amended by the Senate it took care of the Russian situation completely, but it also established a new principle on immigration and permitted political and religious refugees to come in without any restriction whatever. They could also come in here following 1933, and this supposed restriction would have meant the establishment of the principle of permitting such so-called "persecuted, political, and religious refugees" to come into the United States.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It may help in the judicial determination of the bill to here say that this bill would not pass unless it was felt that the courts would give the interpretation to the amendment just offered and unanimously agreed to that the discussion indicates is the wish and desire of the House.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. There are two matters that ought to be mentioned here. This amendment requires a conference and the conference ought to consider the action taken by the House today and not change the word "and" back to "or."

Mr. MCFADDEN. The gentleman is quite correct, and this discussion should be considered as virtually an instruction to the conferees to accept this amendment to the bill when it is under consideration in the conference.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am an ardent and ultrarestrictionist; but I think the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio and accepted by the House makes this bill very acceptable, and in its present form it is humane and wholesome legislation.

This measure will enable some 400 White Russians who fled to this country during the revolution, and who now cannot be deported under existing law, to become American citizens. To deport them, even if we could, under the present Russian regime, would simply mean to send them to Siberia or the firing squad.

I do not care to consume any more of my time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider and a similar House bill, H.R. 3522 were laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to incorporate therein some excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AMEND ACT TO PROVIDE A CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR PUERTO RICO

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5330, to amend the act of March 2, 1917, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Puerto Rico, and for other purposes."

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a new section is hereby inserted between sections 5a and 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Puerto Rico, and for other purposes", approved March 2, 1917, as amended, as follows:

"SEC. 5b. All persons born in Puerto Rico on or after April 11, 1899 (whether before or after the effective date of this act), and not citizens, subjects, or nationals of any foreign power, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as depriving any person, native of Puerto Rico, of his or her American citizenship heretofore otherwise lawfully acquired by such person; or to extend such citizenship to persons who shall have renounced or lost it under the treaties and/or laws of the United States or who are now residing permanently abroad and are citizens or subjects of a foreign country: And provided further, That any woman, native of Puerto Rico and permanently residing therein, who, prior to March 2, 1917, had lost her American nationality by reason of her marriage to an alien eligible to citizenship, or by reason of the loss of the under the provisions of section 4 of the act of September 22, under the provisions of section 4 of the Act of September 22, 1922, entitled 'An act relative to the naturalization and citizenship of married women', as amended."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill seeks to do for approximately 250 Puerto Ricans, who by reason of their absence from the island when the organic act was passed, and by no fault of their own, were denied the privilege of becoming citizens.

The result is that they are people without a country. There are a few in Spain and a few in Chile, native Puerto Ricans who might become citizens under our naturalization laws by complying with them in the event this legislation passes.

Such legislation has been passed with reference to the Virgin Islands, and this simply seeks to give the same privilege to these unfortunate people.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. About a year or 2 years ago we passed something like this for the Virgin Islands. Is that what the gentleman is seeking to do here?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. And did we not pass a bill in reference to Puerto Rico?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Not that I recall. We amended the organic law, but at that time these people could not take advantage of its provisions.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. This is the first bill passed since the organic act was passed for Puerto Rico.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The organic act was passed in 1899, and then an amendment in 1917.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Who are these people that you seek to benefit?

Mr. McDUFFIE. They are native Puerto Ricans who were residing in other countries and come now in Puerto Rico who have not taken advantage of the former acts of Congress by no fault of their own.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I assume that the committee went into this thoroughly and understandingly and that there cannot be any letting down of the bars?

Mr. McDUFFIE. The committee is opposed to letting down the bars.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

PURCHASE OF INDIAN BUFFALO HUNT

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 9003) to purchase and erect in the city of Washington the group of statuary known as "Indian Buffalo Hunt", which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, the Chairmen of the Committees on the Library of the Senate and the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, created a commission authorized and directed to procure the colossal group of statuary known as the "Indian Buffalo Hunt", by Henry K. Bush-Brown, the said statuary to be cast in bronze, to have an appropriate pedestal made therefor, and, subject to the approval of the Commission of Fine Arts, to secure a site for the same in the city of Washington, and to have said bronze group placed thereon.

SEC. 2. That for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts to 20 minutes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to purchase the well-known piece of sculpture known as the "Indian Buffalo Hunt" by the well-known American sculptor, Mr. Bush-Brown. Many, many millions of people have seen this work of art. It was exhibited in Chicago at the World's Fair in 1893, and it stayed for many years in the Union Station in this city, where many millions of other people saw it. It is at present stored in New York City. Mr. Bush-Brown is a well-known American sculptor. This is probably his very finest work. The man is getting old; he is 77 years of age at the present time. The statuary is now stored in New York. It costs money to store a group like this. He ought to know now whether it is going to be considered by the Government or not.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, how much are we going to pay for this?

Mr. KELLER. It is going to cost the Government for purpose of buying it and having it cast in bronze and erected here $45,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. How much for the work itself?

Mr. KELLER. I have forgotten the amount, but that is the total amount.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Where are they going to place it?

Mr. KELLER. Wherever the commission, which consists of the Secretary of War and the Chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library and the Chairman of the House Committee on the Library, may decide, with the consent of the Art Commission here, but some place in the city of Washington. I understand that the Zoological Park will ask to have it placed at one of its entrances.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly.

Mr. TABER. Why should the Treasury pay out $45,000 for this purpose?

Mr. KELLER. We have from time to time, as the gentleman knows, in many cases in this city, expended money for the erection of monuments to our soldiers and statesmen, but to the commemoration of the American Indian and his life we have given absolutely not one penny. This is a characteristic work along that line. Mr. Bush-Brown is 77 years old. He wants to know whether anything is likely to be done. If not, he will of necessity permit the group to be destroyed. It ought not to be destroyed. It ought to be cast in bronze and kept as a work of art.

Mr. TABER. How large a proposition is this?

Mr. KELLER. It is life size, and consists of a buffalo, man, and horse.

Mr. TABER. Of what is it made?

Mr. KELLER. Plaster.

Mr. TABER. Has any effort been made to have the Government buy it before, or has this been exhibited around the country?

Mr. KELLER. It has been mostly exhibited. The Speaker of the House was interested in it for some years, and has been ever since. He think it is a work of art and ought to be kept.

Mr. SWICK. How much will Bush-Brown get out of this?

Mr. KELLER. All that is coming to him, and all that is fair under the conditions, you may be sure of that.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MOTT. It is my understanding that in the case of statues erected to commemorate soldiers, which are placed in various public squares here in Washington, a large part of the expense has been borne by associations organized for the purpose, and that the cost to the Government has been very little, if any, except for the furnishing of the sites.

Mr. KELLER. Sometimes that has been true, and many times it has not.

Mr. MOTT. Has not that been the case in most instances?

Mr. KELLER. In many instances, but in many not.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly.

Mr. TABER. How much has the artist already realized from the exhibition of this work of art?

Mr. KELLER. I understand he has not realized any money to amount to anything. It has simply been a work of art that has appealed to people everywhere, and the Chicago World Fair asked that it be exhibited there. He gave it to them for exhibition purposes. It was then brought here and it was at the Union Station here in Washington for a number of years.

Mr. TABER. How much of this $45,000 is supposed to go to Mr. Bush-Brown?

Mr. KELLER. Frankly, I do not know.

Mr. TABER. How much will it cost to cast it?

Mr. KELLER. The total cost as given by Mr. Bush-Brown himself, including whatever he may get and the cost of erection, would be $45,000.

Mr. TABER. And the gentleman does not know how that is split?

Mr. KELLER. No; I do not.

Mr. TABER. It seems like a large sum.

Mr. KELLER. Not for a group of that size. It surprised me that it could be done for that amount.

Mr. SWANK. That is the statue that used to be in the Union Station?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MOTT. Has this matter been submitted to the Director of the Budget?

Mr. KELLER. I understand so.

Mr. MOTT. Has the Director of the Budget approved it?

Mr. KELLER. I understand it has been approved three or four times.

Mr. MOTT. Does the report show that?

Mr. KELLER. I do not think it does.

Mr. MOTT. I notice the Director of the Budget has disapproved applications for small sums where the money was absolutely needed, and where in some instances the financial fate of a municipality has depended upon the approval of the Budget Director for a necessary appropriation. He has not hesitated to turn down those applications, and that being his attitude, and it being his attitude now to disapprove everything that the President has not approved of in advance, and everything that is not directly in line with the President's financial policy, it would be interesting to know, if the gentleman can tell us, whether the Director of the Budget has approved this appropriation of $45,000.

Mr. KELLER. As you will understand, this is not a bill to appropriate. This is a bill purely to authorize.

Mr. MOTT. The bills to which I have just referred were bills simply to authorize, and the Director of the Budget has declined to approve those authorization bills on the ground that it was not in line with the President's announced policy.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill to commemorate the western atmosphere of the country was once introduced by the present Speaker of this House. I take it that if there were any antagonism toward it by the Budget Director or the administration, the Speaker now would not have recognized the gentleman from Illinois to call it up.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman has just stated that this was a mere authorization; so, if passed, it should not be understood as directing the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate the full amount if, on investigation, it is found to be too high?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly not.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman know why it was not passed at the time it was introduced before?

Mr. KELLER. I do not know. I have not gone into the history of it. I simply know that it is a work of art that many of the artistic people of this country have asked for. Quite a number of organizations sent their representatives before the committee, asking that it be purchased.

Mr. MOTT. I am not going to object to unanimous consent, but I am going to vote against the bill, because I think it is a piece of useless extravagance, when the people all over the country are in need of relief on account of distress, and when municipalities all over the country are in need of aid from the Federal Government and cannot get it. They cannot get it because the Director of the Budget will not authorize it.

Mr. KELLER. The appropriation will not be made immediately. It will be made whenever the committee desires to make it, when they feel the condition of the country justifies it.

Mr. KNUTSON. The amount that we propose to appropriate will buy about 2,000 tons of hay. We need hay worse than we need statues.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. (While counting:)

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point of order for the time being.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) ayes 60, noes 18.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. (After counting:) Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

SPECIAL STATISTICAL STUDIES

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H.R. 9654) to authorize the Department of Commerce to make special statistical studies upon payment of the cost thereof, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. The bill simply gives the Secretary of Commerce authority, upon the request of firms and corporations, to furnish them special statistical facts if they pay the actual cost of it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. There is no cost to the Government?

Mr. RAYBURN. None whatever.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Department of Commerce be, and hereby is, authorized, within the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce, upon the written request of any person, firm, or corporation, to make special statistical studies relating to foreign trade, domestic trade, and other economic matters falling within the province of the Department of Commerce; to prepare from its records special statistical compilations; and to furnish transcripts of its studies, tables, and other records, upon the payment of the actual cost of such work by the person, firm, or corporation requesting it.

SEC. 2. All moneys hereafter received by the Department of Commerce in payment of the cost of such work shall be deposited in a special account to be administered under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce. These moneys may be used, in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce, and notwithstanding any other provision of law for the ordinary expenses incidental to the work and/or to secure in connection therewith the special services of persons who are neither officers nor employees of the United States.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe rules and regulations for the enforcement of this Act; and the Secretary of Commerce shall make a report to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, giving a detailed statement showing (1) the name of every person, firm, or corporation for whom work has been performed under the authority of this statute; (2) the nature of the services rendered to him; (3) the price charged for these services by the Department of Commerce; and (4) the manner in which the moneys received were deposited or used.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF EMERGENCY RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION ACT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 9694) to amend the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, 1933, approved June 16, 1933.

Mr. Speaker, I will state for the information of the Members that when the Emergency Transportation Act was passed last year there was assessed against the railroads of the country $1.50 a mile to pay the expense of the Coordinator of Railroads. The Coordinator has found it will cost at least $2 a mile for the next 12 months, and I may say the short-line railroads have interposed no objection, and 90 percent of the class I railroads have agreed, according to Judge Fletcher, who is counsel for the railway executives.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is this a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of title I of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, 1933, is amended by striking out the second sentence thereof and substituting therefor a sentence reading as follows: "It shall be the duty of each carrier, within 30 days after June 16, 1934, to pay into this fund, for the second year of the operation of this title, $2 for every mile of road operated by it on December 31, 1933, as reported to the Commission, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to collect such assessments."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VETERANS' GUARDIANS

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House Resolution 409.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Veterans' Affairs of the House of Representatives, or a subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the methods and manner of handling of funds and the financial affairs of veterans receiving money as compensation or pensions from the United States Government while under guardianship and subject to the supervision of the United States Veterans' Administration; the losses to the estates of such veterans from negligence, neglect, or misappropriation of funds by guardians and/or conservators; and the manner and method of appointing said guardians, conservators, or other persons, the losses sustained by such veterans while under guardians by reason of the sale of worthless securities by the guardians to such wards; the responsibility for the mishandling of the estates of veterans under guardians; the adequacy of guardians' bonds as provided under the regulations of the Veterans' Administration; and all other questions in relation to the estates of such veterans as are under guardians and receiving compensation, pensions, or other money or things of value from the Government of the United States by reason of veterans' legislation, that would aid the Congress in any necessary remedial legislation.

The committee shall report to the House not later than January 10, 1935, the results of its investigation, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

That said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act at such time and places within the United States, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and production of such books, papers, and documents by subpena or otherwise, to take such testimony. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman or any member designated by him, and shall be served on any person designated by him. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this a special report from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. GREENWOOD. The Committee on Rules granted a rule, but to save time we are bringing it up under unanimous consent. So far as I know there is no objection from any member of the Committee on Rules or from the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. GREENWOOD. It was brought to the attention of my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD], that in some cities there has been a mishandling of veterans' funds and estates by their guardians. A special investigator from the Veterans' Bureau spent some time in one of these homes in Indiana, and there was evidence produced from other places—Chicago, Detroit, and elsewhere. This testimony was submitted to the Rules Committee, and the committee felt this investigation was justified.

Mr. SNELL. Who is to make this investigation?

Mr. GREENWOOD. The subcommittee of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

When the matter was presented to the Rules Committee, a special committee was requested but the Committee on Rules decided that the investigation should be conducted by the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

Mr. SNELL. That committee has not held a meeting during this present session.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The intention of the Committee on Rules was not called to the matter until after this special investigation had been made. When the evidence was disclosed to the Rules Committee it referred the investigation to the legislative committee rather than creating a special committee.

Mr. SNELL. Considering the fact that the Veterans' Committee has not met this session it seems to me rather peculiar to set them up as a special investigating committee for the coming summer. I understood from the reading of the resolution that this committee would have the right to go all over the United States and hold meetings and investigations anywhere. How much money is it expected they will expend in this investigation?

Mr. GREENWOOD. They have the right to administer oaths. I assume that most of the investigation will be made here.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the bill provide that they may hold hearings anywhere in the United States?

Mr. GREENWOOD. But no appropriation is made.

Mr. SNELL. But one will be asked for, of course.

Mr. GREENWOOD. It is contemplated that the investigation will be made here. We are not limiting it to the District of Columbia because it may be necessary to hold a hearing some other place. We do not anticipate that, however.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman remember how many investigating committees have been set up this session?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not recall that; but I do know that the evidence disclosed showed that these estates were being mishandled, that the securities carried in these trust funds were often carried at inflated value and sometimes were worthless. It further disclosed that in a number of instances the appointments were irregular. The evidence submitted in support of this resolution by my colleague, Mr. GRISWOLD, justifies this investigation.

Mr. SNELL. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, Mr. Speaker, whether 4 or 5 years ago we did not have an investigation covering practically the same proposition, the appointment of guardians for mentally incompetent veterans?

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that in 1926 we investigated the conditions at St. Elizabeths Hospital, and out of that grew the present guardianship law.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. RANKIN. Under this law persons acting as guardians were limited, I think, to five guardianships; but the Veterans' Administration thought it best to permit trust companies to handle more, for various and sundry reasons. It now seems that out in Indiana and probably in Chicago and one or two other places there have developed some irregularities. Some of these trust companies failed. An investigation reveals that some of the securities were carried at par when they were not worth par.

We have asked for this investigation in order that we may have the power to swear witnesses and issue subpenas. I may say to the gentleman from New York that my attitude is this: I have appointed a subcommittee. We are going to conduct this investigation without a brass band and a parade, and at just as little expense as possible. My honest opinion is that it will not be necessary for the subcommittee to leave Washington, because we have at our command all the forces of the Government to make these special investigations, and we will have the right under this resolution to subpena witnesses and demand that they come before the investigating committee.

We want to develop the facts necessary to prosecute any persons who have violated the law, with reference to these guardianships.

Mr. SNELL. Cannot those who have violated the law be prosecuted at the present time?

Mr. RANKIN. Further, we want to determine whether it is possible to bring suits and recover those funds, and, if necessary, to amend the law so as to prevent conditions of this kind occurring in the future. We want this information so we may proceed with the necessary legislation.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Under the trust laws of the various States a trustee mishandling trust funds may be prosecuted. If the gentleman knows of guardians and trustees who have abused the law why does he not have proceedings instituted against them under present law?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, permit me to say that the law enforcement officials of practically every State in the Union have done that; but in Indiana, and probably one or two other States, they did not, according to the report. We want this information, therefore, to see whether or not there is anything the Federal Government can do to stop this misuse of veterans' funds and to prevent such conditions in the future.

The funds of these insane veterans must be protected.

Mr. GREENWOOD. In connection with that nearly all States have different laws with reference to the handling of these trust funds, but there is no uniformity.

There is a certain amount of responsibility that is lodged in the Veterans' Affairs Committee. This committee wants to get the different angles from the various States on the question of acceptance of securities. We found securities that were not worth more than 50 cents on the dollar being carried at par. The investigator said he thought there would be a loss so far as the security investments were concerned of 50 percent.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know of any one who has had investments in recent years which have shown a profit?

Mr. RICH. Regardless of whether it is a veteran's or some other estate, the gentleman knows that that situation exists in connection with practically every trust fund today to a certain extent.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understand that is so.

Mr. RICH. It may not be that there was any discrepancy on the part of the ones administering the funds. It is a condition under which all trusts are being handled at the present time.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That may be partially true. We are not interested in other estates, but we are interested in preserving the securities involved in guardianships of these veteran mental cases.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am in favor of the gentleman's resolution, but does he not think the record ought to show that the Veterans' Administration is already vigorously investigating this matter and has accumulated a great deal of information which has been laid before the Rules Committee?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am willing for that statement to go into the RECORD. In fact, the gentleman from Mississippi said they were going to use the instrumentalities of the Veterans' Bureau for this investigation. There is no inclination on the part of the resolution to crowd the Veterans' Bureau out of the picture.

Mr. RANKIN. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], I desire to say that I agree with him that all trust funds have suffered in this depression and the veterans have lost less in proportion to the amount involved than the people of the country generally, but we do not want them to lose any more.

Mr. RICH. If this investigation is held in Washington, it is the idea and purpose of the committee to hold the expenditures of the investigation down as far as possible?

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. MOTT. The principal purpose of this resolution is to enable the committee to gather information in order to improve this law?

Mr. GREENWOOD. It is for the purpose of recommending additional legislation that will still further protect investments with reference to these guardianships. We have found a looseness which exists in various States. The facts developed before the Rules Committee justifies a thorough investigation.

Mr. MOTT. The purpose of the investigation is to offer an amendment to the existing law?

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman is not asking this investigation for the purpose of accumulating evidence for the prosecution of certain cases?

Mr. GREENWOOD. No. The Veterans' Committee is asking for this additional information for legislative purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RESEARCH VESSEL FOR BUREAU OF FISHERIES

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 8930) to provide for the construction and operation of a vessel for use in research work with respect to ocean fisheries.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when funds are made available as authorized by section 2 of this act, the Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed (1) to cause plans and specifications to be prepared for the construction and equipment of a vessel for use in such research work with respect to ocean fisheries as the Secretary finds will be useful to persons engaged in the fishing industry; and (2) to contract for the construction and equipment of such vessel. Such vessel shall be maintained and operated under the supervision of the Secretary of Commerce.

SEC. 2. There is authorized to be appropriated $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the purposes of the first sentence of section 1 of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to carry out work that was undertaken and has been carried on by the Bureau of Fisheries for several years.

In 1879 the work commenced with a vessel known as the Fish Hawk. After that there was a vessel that was known as the Albatross, which became useless from age, was decommissioned, and sold. Then there was procured from the Navy a vessel known as the Albatross II. This was found to be uneconomical in operation, and has been decommissioned.

The Bureau of Fisheries carries on a scientific research in the ocean waters along the Atlantic coast, and particularly the North Atlantic coast. The work that is proposed to be done is similar to that which is conducted by other nations. Without the opportunity to carry on this work much of the valuable work that has been done by the Bureau of Fisheries will be lost. For this character of work Great Britain has 5 research vessels, Scotland 3, Ireland 1, Egypt 1, South Africa 1, Norway 1, Sweden 1, Denmark 3, Russia 3, Germany 2, Belgium 1, France 3, Portugal 1, and Japan 1.

The work that is done is of a scientific character. The Bureau is able to predict the general trend of the run of fish, and also to put into operation matters for the economical conduct of the industry.

The Bureau of Fisheries went before the Appropriations Committee, as I understand, and asked for an appropriation for a vessel of this kind. My information is that the witnesses created a very favorable impression, but the Appropriations Committee was of the opinion that there should be legislative authority for its action. This bill simply gives the legislative authority which is necessary for the Appropriations Committee to consider the proposal. They say that they cannot consider it now without legislative authority.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is the Director of the Budget favorable to this bill?

Mr. BLAND. The matter has not been passed on by the Director of the Budget, but in view of the fact that the appropriation must come before the Appropriations Committee, that matter could then be taken care of by the Director of the Budget. It will be noted the particular language of this resolution is "when funds are made available as authorized by section 2." This is simply legislative authority for the proposition.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the operations of this boat would be confined to the Atlantic coast?

Mr. BLAND. Not necessarily confined to the Atlantic coast, but that is the contemplated work to which it will be adopted in the early years of its use. It could be used in other places. On the Pacific coast there are now some vessels. I think there are about 16 on the Pacific coast.

Mr. MOTT. Vessels of this character owned by the Government and doing the same kind of work?

Mr. BLAND. They are vessels of not as modern a type as this vessel. There is really need that there should be one out there a little later in order to keep up with the other nations of the world in respect of the work they are doing.

But there are, in fact, vessels on the Pacific coast that are doing some work of this kind for the Bureau of Fisheries.

There are about 16, as I recall, that are used principally around Alaska and along the Pacific coast.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Why do we need to spend as much as $500,000 for a ship of this kind? Are there not a lot of ships under the Shipping Board or connected with the Government in one way or another, that could be used for this purpose?

Mr. BLAND. That matter has been investigated very carefully by the Bureau of Fisheries and it has been found that the vessels now owned by the Navy or the Coast Guard or the Hydrographic Service are not adapted to the peculiar scientific work that this vessel would have to perform.

Mr. TABER. Would it not be better for us to have a smaller ship than this amount would produce and take some vessel that could be fixed up for use in this work? The other countries have already fixed up some other type of vessel, have they not?

Mr. BLAND. In my opinion, this money would be required, but in view of the fact this is an authorization and the question of the extent of the appropriation would come before the committee of which the distinguished gentleman is a member, that question would more appropriately direct itself to that committee.

Mr. TABER. It seems to me that in these days we ought to get along without spending any more money than we have to, and that is why I have asked the question.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TABER. I would think the gentleman from Massachusetts could enlighten us upon this matter.

Mr. McCORMACK. Before I introduced this bill I looked into the matter very extensively, and I took it up with the Bureau of Fisheries in the Department of Commerce, first, with respect to the question of whether or not such legislation is necessary. I found that it is reasonably necessary to authorize the appropriation. The question which the gentleman from New York has so pertinently and properly asked was also looked into by me, and I found that it was the opinion of the Bureau of Fisheries that there were no vessels available which could be transferred from some other Department and utilized for this work.

Mr. BLAND. The committee also went into that.

Mr. McCORMACK. The committee went into that very extensively. I can assure the gentleman that all those aspects were thoroughly looked into and considered by the committee and by myself, and the bill as reported represents the unanimous action of the committee.

Mr. TABER. Would the gentleman be able to tell us something about the type of boat that is to be required?

Mr. McCORMACK. The type of boat we want or what is hoped for is one that a government like ours should have in order to make the necessary research with respect to this time-honored calling that has played such an important part in the development of our country—the fisheries.

Mr. BLAND. The Bureau of Fisheries states—

We have, therefore, specified that the new ship shall be able to handle standard trawl gear and shall have bunker capacity for 3 weeks' cruising in order to reach distant fishing grounds. It must have a speed as low as 1½ knots in order to fish with silk plankton nets, and a cruising speed of 12 knots in order to reduce the total cruising time. The vessel should also have a small hold capable of carrying 10 tons of fish and refrigeration machinery and ample facilities for scientific work aboard. In addition to the usual crew, six seamen will be necessary on cruisers where trawling is done, and space should be provided for them as well as for the scientific staff.

In order to fulfill these requirements, a reliable firm of consulting engineers and architects in Boston estimates that the vessel should be about 160 feet in length, driven by a 1,000-horsepower electric motor, powered by four diesel electric generators. The cost of such a vessel would be about $500,000 for building and equipment.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Does not the Government now own 100 ships that would be suitable for this work that are now tied up and rotting at Seattle and Philadelphia?

Mr. BLAND. After careful investigation by the Bureau of Fisheries they say they cannot carry the necessary instruments and provide the necessary facilities.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the gentleman will permit, the evidence also discloses the fact that the maintenance charges on an existing vessel if it were transferred from the Navy or the Coast Guard to the Bureau of Fisheries would be much greater than if a new vessel were built. This was an important item of consideration in connection with a vessel which might be converted into a research vessel, in addition to the fact that it would not accomplish the purposes and meet the objectives which are desired.

Mr. TABER. Would the gentleman be able to tell us whether other countries have built new ships for this purpose or whether they have converted something they already had?

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot answer that question, but I believe my friend the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MORAN] can say something about that.

Mr. MORAN. The hearings developed the fact that every first-class fisheries nation has a ship of this type; and, furthermore, the same question had arisen there as here with respect to whether or not some older vessel would not serve the purpose. As I recall the testimony, it was invariably the fact that every nation has a special type of boat and none of them has been able to use its old ships.

Mr. BLAND. I may say that I have before me photographs of two very handsome vessels, one the Shonan Maru, Japan's 151-foot research vessel, powered with two 340-horsepower diesels, and equipped with complete, modern research apparatus; and the Biologen, the new research vessel of the Danish Biological Station, which replaces an older and smaller vessel.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I might say further that the gentleman from the west coast made a very pertinent inquiry. I think a nation of our size, with the tremendous value of our fisheries, ought to have at least two research vessels, and in view of the important part played in our past history by fishermen and by this industry, I think we should have probably from three to five of such research vessels, and I shall join any effort seeking to provide such a research vessel for the west coast if the matter should come up for consideration later.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman accept an amendment?

Mr. McCORMACK. Let us go ahead with this one. Let us utilize this and then we can afterward go ahead on one for the west coast.

Mr. MOTT. I am not going to object, but I hope that we will get the support of the gentleman for the west coast next session.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Why could not they use a vessel that is now lying in Seattle which has been used in the ocean-going trade?

Mr. BLAND. Because it is not adapted to this use. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMEND GRAIN FUTURES ACT

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 9623) to amend the Grain Futures Act to prevent and remove obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grains and other commodities by regulating transactions therein on commodity future exchanges, by providing means for limiting short selling and speculation in such commodities on such exchanges, by licensing commission merchants dealing in such commodities for future delivery on such exchanges, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the Grain Futures Act (U.S.C., title 7, sec. 1) is amended to read as follows: "This act shall be known by the short title of 'Commodity Exchange Act.'"

SEC. 2. The Grain Futures Act (U.S.C., title 7, secs. 1 to 17, inclusive) is amended by striking out the word "grain" wherever it appears in such act and inserting in lieu thereof "commodity", "any commodity", or "commodities", as the case may require.

SEC. 3. Section 2 of the Grain Futures Act (U.S.C., title 7, sec. 2) is amended by—

(a) striking out the third sentence of paragraph (a) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The word 'commodity' shall mean wheat, cotton, rice, corn, oats, barley, rye, flaxseed, grain sorghums, and mill feeds."; and

(b) adding at the end of paragraph (a) the following sentences: "The words 'cooperative association of producers' shall mean any bona fide cooperative association, corporate or otherwise, owned or controlled by producers of agricultural products whether of not qualified under the act of Congress of February 18, 1922 (U.S.C., title 7, secs. 291 and 292), or any organization acting for a group of such associations and owned or controlled by such associations. The words 'member of a contract market' shall mean and include individuals, associations, partnerships, corporations, and trusts owning or holding membership in, or admitted to membership representation on, a contract market or given members' trading privileges thereon. The words 'futures commission merchant' shall mean and include individuals, associations, partnerships, corporations, and trusts engaged in soliciting or in accepting orders for the purchase or sale of any commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any contract market and that, in or in connection with such solicitation or acceptance of orders, accepts any money, securities, or property (or extends credit in lieu thereof) to margin, guarantee, or secure any trades or contracts that result or may result therefrom. The words 'floor broker' shall mean any person who, in or surrounding any 'pit', 'ring', 'post', or other place provided for the meeting of persons similarly engaged, shall engage in executing for others any order for the purchase or sale of any commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any contract market, and who for such services receives or accepts any commission or other compensation. The words 'the commission' shall mean the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General."

SEC. 4. Section 4 of the Grain Futures Act (U.S.C., title 7, sec. 6) is amended by—

(a) striking out the word "except" at the end of the first paragraph;

(b) striking out all of paragraph (a); and

(c) striking out the parentheses and letter "b" and the word "Where" at the beginning of paragraph (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the words "except, in any of the foregoing cases, where".

SEC. 5. The Grain Futures Act is amended by adding after section 4 (U.S.C., title 7, sec. 6) the following new sections:

"SEC. 4a. (1) Excessive speculation in any commodity, causing sudden or unreasonable fluctuations or unwarranted changes in the price of such commodity, is an undue and unnecessary burden on interstate commerce in such commodity. For the purpose of diminishing, eliminating, or preventing such burden, the commission shall, by order, fix such limit or limits on the amount of trading under contracts of sale of such commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any contract market which may be done by any person as the commission finds is necessary to diminish, eliminate, or prevent such burden. The trading limit may be fixed in different amounts for different markets and for different futures or delivery months, or a trading limit may be fixed to apply to all markets and all futures of any commodity. Such trading limit may be different for the different purposes of subparagraphs (A) and (B) hereof and may be fixed in certain amounts for buying operations and in the same or different amounts for selling operations. The commission shall, in such order, fix a reasonable time (not to exceed 10 days) after the order's promulgation; after which, and until such order is suspended, modified, or revoked, it shall be unlawful for any person—

"(A) directly or indirectly to buy or sell, or agree to buy or sell, under contracts of sale of such commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any contract market, any amount of such commodity during any one business day in excess of the trading limit or limits fixed by the commission in such order for or with respect to such commodity; or

"(B) directly or indirectly to buy or sell, or agree to buy or sell, under contracts of sale of such commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any contract market, any amount of such commodity that shall result in giving such person a net-long or net-short position at any one time in or with respect to any such commodity in excess of the trading limit or limits fixed by the commission in such order for or with respect to such commodity.

"(2) The trading limits authorized in paragraph (1) of this section shall not apply to transactions which are shown to be bona fide hedging transactions. Transactions known as 'spreads' or 'straddles' may be exempted in such order of the commission, or the commission in such order may fix different trading limits applying to such spread or straddle transactions.

"(3) For the purpose of paragraph (2) of this section, hedging transactions shall mean sales of any commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade, to the extent that such sales are offset in quantity by the ownership or purchase of cash commodities or, conversely, purchases for future delivery to the extent that such purchases are offset by sales of cash commodities. There shall be included in the amount of any commodity which may be hedged by any person—

"(A) the amount of such commodity such person is raising, or in good faith intends or expects to raise, within the next 12 months, on land (in the United States or its Territories) which such person owns or leases;

"(B) an amount of such commodity the sale of which for future delivery would be a reasonable hedge against the products or byproducts of such commodity owned or purchased by such person, or the purchase of which for future delivery would be a reasonable hedge against the sale of any product or byproduct of such commodity by such person.

"(4) This section shall apply to a person that is licensed as a futures commission merchant or as floor broker under authority of this act only to the extent that transactions made by such persons are made on behalf of or for the account or benefit of such person. This section shall not apply to transactions made by, or on behalf of, or at the direction of the United States, or a duly authorized agency thereof.

"SEC. 4b. It shall be unlawful for any member of a contract market, or for any correspondent, agent, or employee of any member, in or in connection with any order to make, or the making of, any contract of sale of any commodity in interstate commerce, or for future delivery, made, or to be made, on or subject to the rules of any contract market for or on behalf of any person if such contract for future delivery is or may be used for (1) hedging any transaction in interstate commerce in such commodity or the products or byproducts thereof, or (2) determining the price basis of any such transaction in interstate commerce in such commodity, or (3) delivering any such commodity sold, shipped, or received in interstate commerce for the fulfillment thereof—

"(A) to cheat or defraud or attempt to cheat or defraud such person;

"(B) willfully to make or cause to be made to such person any false report or statement thereof, or willfully to enter or cause to be entered for such person any false record thereof;

"(C) willfully to deceive or attempt to deceive such persons by any means whatsoever in regard to any such order or contract or the disposition or execution of any such order or contract, or in regard to any act of agency performed with respect to such order or contract for such person; or

"(D) to bucket such order, or to fill such order by offset against the order or orders of any other person, or willfully and knowingly and without the prior consent of such person to become the buyer in respect to any selling order of such person, or become the seller in respect to any buying order of such person.

"SEC. 4c. It shall be unlawful for any person to offer to enter into, enter into, or confirm the execution of, any transaction involving any commodity, which is or may be used for (1) hedging any transaction in interstate commerce in such commodity or the products or byproducts thereof, or (2) determining the price basis of any such transaction in interstate commerce in such commodity, or (3) delivering any commodity sold, shipped, or received in interstate commerce for the fulfillment thereof—

"(A) if such transaction is, or is of the character, commonly known to the trade as a 'wash sale', 'cross trade', or 'accommodation trade', or is a fictitious sale;

"(B) if such transaction is, or is of the character, commonly known to the trade as a 'privilege', 'indemnity', 'bid', 'offer', 'put', 'call', 'advance guaranty', or 'decline guaranty', or

"(C) if such transaction is used to cause any price to be reported, registered, or recorded which is not a true and bona fide price.

"Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to prevent the exchange of futures in connection with cash commodity transactions or of futures for cash commodities, or of 'transfer trades' or 'office trades' if made in accordance with board of trade rules applying to such transactions and such rules shall not have been disapproved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

"SEC. 4d. It shall be unlawful for any person to engage as futures commission merchant in soliciting orders or accepting orders for the purchase or sale of any commodity for future delivery, or involving any contracts of sale or contracts to sell any commodity for future delivery, on or subject to the rules of any contract market unless—

"(1) such person shall have been licensed by the Secretary of Agriculture as such futures commission merchant and such license shall not have expired nor been suspended nor revoked; and

"(2) such person shall, whether a member or nonmember of a contract market, treat and deal with all money, securities, and property received by such person to margin, guarantee, or secure the trades or contracts of any customer of such person or accruing to such customer as the result of such trades or contracts as belonging to such customer. Such money, securities, and property shall not be used to margin or guarantee the trades or contracts, or to secure or extend the credit, of any customer or person other than the one for whom the same are held: Provided, however, That such money, securities, and property may be deposited or pledged separately and apart or commingled with the deposits and pledges of such person with any bank or trust company and that such share thereof as shall be necessary to margin, guarantee, or secure the contracts or trades of such customer carried with the clearing house organization of such contract market or with a member of such contract market, may be deposited or pledged with such clearing house organization or with such member.

"SEC. 4e. (1) Any person desiring to be licensed as futures commission merchant or as floor broker hereunder shall make application to the Secretary of Agriculture, which application shall be made in form and manner to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving such information and facts as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary concerning the business in which the applicant is or will be engaged, including, in the case of applications of futures commission merchants, the names and addresses of the managers of all branch offices and of all correspondents and agents engaged in soliciting or accepting on behalf of such applicant any orders for the purchase or sale of any commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade, and including also the names of its officers and partners, if a partnership, and of its officers, directors, and/or stockholders, as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, if a corporation. Such person, when licensed hereunder, shall likewise continue to report and furnish to the Secretary of Agriculture the above-mentioned information and such other information pertaining to his business as the Secretary of Agriculture may require.

"(2) Any person licensed as futures commission merchant hereunder shall post in a conspicuous place in each of the offices maintained by such person in the United States in which orders for the purchase or sale of any commodity for future delivery are solicited or accepted, the original or duplicate copy (issued by the Secretary of Agriculture) of such person's license as such futures commission merchant. All licenses shall expire on the 31st day of December of the year for which issued.

"SEC. 4f. It shall be unlawful for any person to act as floor broker in executing any orders for the purchase or sale of any commodity for future delivery, or involving any contracts of sale or contracts to sell any commodity for future delivery, on or subject to the rules of any contract market unless such person shall have been licensed by the Secretary of Agriculture as such floor broker and such license shall not have expired nor been suspended nor revoked.

"SEC. 4g. If any person licensed hereunder as futures commission merchant or floor broker shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or any of the rules or regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture hereunder, or shall fail or refuse to make any report required by the Secretary of Agriculture regarding the transactions of such person, or the transactions of the customers thereof, in commodities for future delivery on any board of trade in the United States or elsewhere, or shall fail or refuse to keep the books and records pertaining to such transactions in the form and manner required by the Secretary of Agriculture, or shall fail or refuse to keep such books and records open to inspection by any representative of the United States Department of Agriculture or the United States Department of Justice, the license of such person may be suspended or revoked after notice and hearing in accordance with the procedure described in paragraph (b) of section 6 of this act.

"SEC. 4h. It shall be unlawful for any person—

SEC. 13. This act shall take effect 90 days after the date of its amendment.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I would not present a bill of this importance under suspension of the rules but for the fact that the passage of the so-called "stock exchange bill" makes it very desirable that legislation of this kind be enacted.

This is not a partisan measure, and is supported by practically all members of the Agricultural Committee, with perhaps two exceptions.

It is to amend the Grain Futures Act. Instead of having that act limited to grain, it changes the word to "commodities" and amends the act in such a way as to make it commodity legislation, including, in addition to the items now on the list, rice, cotton, and mill feeds.

It authorizes the board, which is provided in the original act, to have a further power of fixing trade limits which any man or concern may have in the way of short or long speculative position in the market at one time. The board is composed of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General. When that board has fixed the trade limit, which any one firm must keep, then any sales beyond that limit are forbidden.

It has developed during these years that there are from 8 to 16 traders on the Chicago Board of Trade who have been largely responsible for the constant fluctuations in the market that has occurred during the raiding of the market. These violent fluctuations have been caused largely by these big traders, such as Arthur Cutten, who are not interested in any way in the maintenance of the market. I have as an illustration some propaganda put out by one of the brokerage houses on April 17 of this year.

It starts off:

Nthing but a miracle can keep grains up. Sell on rallies.

We see no reason for buying grains at this time. Sell on rallies.

All the economists, analysts, and market services must have gotten the same tip, judging by the hydrophobia bullishness of their opinions. We said, "Sell on rallies."

What the world is looking for now is good customers. Why legislate against them?

We know of something definite that will positively affect the markets as they have not been affected for years and which very seldom occurs.

This cannot be explained in this letter. In fact, it is the most legitimate thing that has happened to the grain trade during this administration and will produce the biggest single effect in the market of anything except wide-open inflation.

They do not in a single instance in this propaganda refer to the prices to be paid to the farmer; they do not say anything about a legitimate market for the produce of the farm, but are interested only in the profits in a speculative way because of the transactions in which they engage. This bill will stop these accommodations, trades, options, indemnities, crosstrading, wash sales, puts and calls and will leave hedging untouched. Otherwise, it will leave the market open except for the trading limits which may be established by the board. I want to see these institutions made what they were intended to be—a market place for the actual commodities. I want to see the gambling abolished.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MAY. In other words, by the stock-exchange regulation bill that we put through we take control of the speculation in stocks and bonds and securities on the stock exchanges, and by this bill we do identically the same thing in respect to commodities such as wheat and oats and corn, and so forth.

Mr. JONES. Largely the same thing, and the same in principle. If anyone is interested in the comparative changes, they may be found in the report which sets out the regular grain exchange bill which it changes. If they violate the terms of the act, the Secretary will have the right to close them and stop their operations entirely.

Mr. MAY. What was the proof in the hearings of the committee with regard to the character of speculation that is indulged in in dealings in commodities at certain markets such as Chicago, for instance, as compared with the stock-exchange business in New York?

Mr. JONES. They have the same character of trading. There was one man named Cutten who operated without making reports and was short as high as 10,000,000 bushels of wheat at one time.

Mr. MAY. In other words he is the J. P. Morgan of the grain exchange in Chicago as compared with Mr. Morgan in New York?

Mr. JONES. Yes; he is interested in the money he can make out of it, of course. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill is necessary to give protection to the American farmer. It seems to me that the present law, the Grain Futures Act, is entirely inadequate in that it does not have enough teeth in it to permit the Department of Agriculture to properly regulate the grain exchanges. This bill proposes to put some teeth into the law. At least the bill goes as far as the Department of Agriculture recommends, and the officials of the Department of Agriculture believe that if this bill is enacted they will be able to more advantageously deal with the grain and cotton exchanges. I call the attention of the membership of the House to the present system which unreasonably taxes the American farmer for services of the grain exchanges. Last year there were about 500 million bushels of wheat produced in the United States. On the Chicago Board of Trade alone more than 20 times that amount was sold for future delivery.

In other words, although we produced in the United States about a half billion bushels of wheat the future sales on the Board of Trade of Chicago alone were 20 times that much. Of course, more than 500,000,000 bushels of wheat were sold in cash sales, and in all those cash sales the commission men got a commission of a cent and a half a bushel, and the American people have been led to believe that that is the only charge made for the handling of this wheat. In addition to the cash sales of wheat, there were 10,000,000,000 bushels of speculative sales on the Chicago exchange alone, which means that a commission was paid 20 times for the handling of that wheat in addition to the commission paid on the so-called "cash sales", when the deliveries of wheat were made. The commission charges on futures sales are one-eighth of 1 cents a bushel for members of the exchange, and the commission companies charge other people one-quarter of a cent a bushel. Twenty times an eighth of a cent is 2½ cents a bushel, but for sales made by people not members of the exchange it meant 20 times a quarter of a cent, or 5 cents a bushel, making a total, including commissions on cash sales of all the way from 4 to 6½ cents a bushel commission charges on every bushel of wheat that was sold in the United States last year. It makes an entirely different picture, and it is because of these so-called "speculative dealings" that this tremendous handling charge is placed on wheat, and those commission charges must be taken out of the selling price of wheat before the farmer gets his price, because the commission men sell it for as much as they can get and they take out all commissions and gambling profits and give the farmer what is left. The present law permits too large a commission to be paid to the commission company. This bill will permit the Department of Agriculture to limit speculative trades, so that there will not be so many of these so-called "futures purchase and sales", and there will not be so much money paid out in commissions.

The only justification advanced for future sales and purchases is that the commission men and exchanges say that the future purchases provide an additional market for the farmer's grain. They say that if the speculators buy 10,000,000,000 bushels of wheat for future delivery they are thereby helping the farmers by providing a market, creating a demand for his wheat, but they fail to tell you that when that speculator buys that wheat for speculative purposes he also has that additional amount of wheat on hand, which increases the supply to the same extent and negatives any benefit that the farmer might have obtained by the supposed increased demand. There is no justification for this tremendous gambling and speculating on the grain exchanges, and I hope this bill will pass, because it will give the Department of Agriculture some little help in trying to prevent this abuse. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] as he may desire.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I first want to congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, for bringing in this bill to regulate the grain and cotton exchanges. From the standpoint of the cotton farmers this is one of the most important pieces of legislation that has come before the American Congress since I have been a member of it; and I am sure it will prove of as much benefit to the farmers in the Grain Belt.

The farmers of this country have lost hundreds of millions of dollars through the manipulation of the market on these exchanges. Those manipulators toil not neither do they spin, but they invariably take all the profit of the farmer's crop and leave him with the bills to pay. These outrageous practices should have been stopped long ago, and they would have been stopped if we had had an administration that was more in sympathy with the farmer than it was with those who profiteered at his expense.

When I was a boy, I planted a patch of cotton one year and raised a good-sized remnant, or part of a bale. I put it with another remnant raised by one of the neighbor boys, had it packed into a bale, and he and I took it to town, counting the money we were going to get and deciding what we would buy with it. When we reached the cotton yard the first thing they told us was that cotton was off—the price had gone down. Our feathers fell. I wondered where cotton got off. I saw where we were going to get off.

For many years, I heard that same story drummed into the ears of disappointed farmers—"cotton is off today." During those years, I wondered who fixed the price of cotton and how it was fixed and where it was fixed. I at last found out, and I am going to tell you in as few words as possible how the price of cotton is fixed.

Some years ago I visited the New York Cotton Exchange. At that time it was on the nineteenth floor of a building overlooking Wall Street. While we were waiting for the exchange to open, one of its former presidents led me over to a window and said, "I want to show you what a wonderful view we have." As I looked down, I could see below me the elevated railways flying with lightninglike rapidity, carrying their human burden to every section of the world's greatest city. Below them I could see automobiles and pedestrians rushing to and fro in feverish haste through Wall Street, the world's financial center; and I realized that even below them the subway trains were roaring past. Over to the left, I could see East River, spanned by Brooklyn Bridge, across which pass daily more people than over any other bridge in the world. To my right I could see the harbor and the Atlantic Ocean covered with sail and steamships, bearing their burdens of freight and passengers to every port in the world. He said, "Isn't this a marvelous picture?" I said, "Yes, but did you know that if the farmers of this country were to fail, the chances are that those elevated railways would cease to run, Wall Street would become a panic, the subways would cease to roar, Brooklyn Bridge would be crowded with the anxious faces of hungry men, women, and children, and your commerce would fade from the face of the earth?"

At about that time the clock struck and the cotton exchange opened. In the center of the room was a circular rail about waist high and around it men were crowded, some with their sleeves rolled up, their collars unbuttoned, tearing their hair, their veins standing out like whipcords, yelling at the top of their voices, trying to buy or sell cotton—America's greatest commodity. At intervals around that ring a man was standing with a white glove on his hand. When a sale was made, he reported it by the use of the deaf and dumb alphabet, the noise being too great for his voice to be heard and understood. At that time, the smallest number of bales that could be sold on the exchange was 100. If one man offered a lot of cotton for sale, of a hundred bales or more, and another man bought it, we will say at 12 cents a pound, the man with the white glove on his hand telegraphed the news to a man on a platform who was using a telephone. We will say that cotton was sold on October delivery. The only information the man with the gloved hand gave was "October 12 cents", meaning that a sale had been made for October delivery and that the price was 12 cents a pound. The man on the platform immediately telephoned this information to a man on the other side of the room who was marking up the board. Under the October column he simply wrote the figure "12", meaning that the last sale on October delivery was 12 cents a pound. That information was immediately flashed to every exchange in the world.

A few minutes later, another sale was made, also for October delivery. This time the price was 12.10 cents—10 cents a hundred pounds or 50 cents a bale more than the previous sale. This information was transmitted by the gloved hand and telephoned to the man at the board, who wrote under the October column the figures "12.10", showing that the last sale for October delivery was $12.10 a hundred pounds. This information was immediately flashed to every exchange in the world.

We will say a farmer on the streets of your town had 10 bales of cotton on his wagon. The cotton merchant who was buying it raised his voice and inquired of the man in the window of the local exchange what the market was doing. The answer came back that it went up 10 points. He immediately turns to the farmer and says, "I can give you 10 points more, or $5 more for your 10 bales of cotton than I could a few moments ago." In other words, the last sale on the exchange fixes the price. That is where cotton gets off.

So long as we have a free, an open, and well-regulated exchange, all is well and good, but the last few years, there has developed a practice of manipulating the exchange so as to drive the price down when the farmer is selling and to raise it after his crop is all gone.

In 1927, certain large cotton factors in this country got a lot of cotton passed by the Government classers that was below the standard, but because it was approved by the Government classers, it could be offered on the exchange, and anyone who bid and bought it could be forced to accept it at the price stipulated.

Manufacturers who wanted cotton for their own use sent their representatives on to the floor of the exchange to buy, but when they found that they had bought a contract from the people owning this low-grade cotton, they simply paid their losses and got out. As a result, the market fell from 22 cents a pound down to about 12 or 13 cents a pound, in a few weeks.

I took the floor here and exposed to the Congress and to the country what was being done. It created an uproar throughout the cotton trade. The farmers were desperate, and small cotton merchants were being ruined. The Senate appointed an investigating committee, and they invited me to come over and help conduct the investigation. I sent and had samples of this cotton brought to Washington. I had it reclassed by disinterested cotton classers from the various spot exchanges of the country. I proved every charge that I made, and have the sworn testimony to substantiate it. We forced them to clean out that low-grade cotton and alter the rules of the exchange so as to prevent such a thing occurring again. Cotton went up by leaps and bounds. While we were on that investigation, it went up 8 cents a pound, or $40 a bale. That $40 a bale went into the pockets of the farmers who still had cotton for sale.

That is one method in which the exchange may be manipulated to the great detriment of the man who toils through the summer months to make a few bales of cotton to carry him and his family through the year. That is another way that cotton gets off, to the detriment of the farmer.

Another vicious practice is what they call "straddles"—straddling between exchanges or straddling between months. Now they are enabled, under what they call southern deliveries, to straddle between delivery points. Only the big firms can straddle, but by doing so they can so manipulate the market as to destroy the little fellows and invariably depress the price when they want to buy and raise the price when they go to sell. That is another way that cotton sometimes gets off.

Unless our cotton farmers have some such protection as this bill offers, they can never hope to receive for their cotton the full measure of its worth.

President Roosevelt has announced his policy of trying to take care of the "forgotten man." No man under the American flag has been more thoroughly forgotten by his Government, worse neglected, or worse imposed upon than the cotton-grower of the South. He has paid the highest interest rate in the world. He has been plundered by high protective tariffs that levy a tax on everything he buys, from the swaddling clothes of infancy to the lining of the coffin in which old age is laid away. He has been robbed through these criminal manipulations of the cotton market. I sometimes think that Edwin Markham must have had him in mind when he wrote his famous poem, "The Man with the Hoe":

> Bowed by the weight of centuries, he leans
> Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
> The emptiness of ages in his face,
> And on his back the burden of the world.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that an administration has at last come into power that fosters a measure of this kind to protect the cotton and grain growers of the Nation from exploitation through the exchanges, and I again congratulate my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. JONES] for bringing out this measure to help the farmer secure a just price for the products of his toil. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER], such time as he may desire.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I agree with my friend who has just spoken, that this is one of the most important pieces of legislation which this Congress has considered or will consider during this session.

As stated by the chairman a moment ago, this is a companion bill to go along with the bill which we have just passed with reference to the other exchanges. The abuses that have grown out of future trading are something that have been extremely harmful to the people of the United States engaged in agriculture. Early in my experience in this Congress I introduced a bill to prevent gambling in futures on exchanges. It is not a new proposition to me. I have been advocating it for a long time, and I am glad today to have an opportunity of voting for a bill that, in my opinion, will do more for agriculture than almost anything that could be done.

I appreciate the splendid address by the gentleman from the other side of the aisle that was made here today. I want to say for the members of the Committee on Agriculture on the other side that we have had a fine spirit of cooperation and helpful thought from them, in helping to make this the very best bill that could possibly be made. We have had the best thought that we could get from the entire committee. As stated by the chairman, it is a practically unanimous voice of the entire 26 members of the Committee on Agriculture. I do not believe there ought to be a single vote against this measure, and I hope there will not be.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee referred to Mr. Arthur Cutten. A few days ago I had some remarks to make with reference to J. P. Morgan when we passed the stock exchange bill. I want to place in the same category with Mr. Morgan, Mr. Arthur Cutten, of Chicago, who has ruined more farmers in this country than any other single man. If you could gather together all the bones of the people he has caused to die an economic death, they would form a triumphal arch from Chicago to New York, where he went for bigger gambling operations, through which he could safely ride. Destroy the Chicago grain racketeers now when we have the chance.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that every time a man sells a bushel of grain on the market, someone else buys it. Therefore, it has been difficult for me to understand just why the market is unduly influenced by buying and selling in futures or in cash transactions, because it must be true that just as many bushels have been sold as have been bought on every day's transaction. But when we look into the matter we discover that the speculators who deal in large quantities are the ones who dominate the trading. They are the fellows who corner the market. They are able to govern and control large blocks and thereby fleece the honest dealers and beat the market up or down to the detriment of the farmer, the producer, and the ordinary trader on the board. This fact was specifically shown by the hearings and is the proposition to which I call your attention. The representatives from the Department gave us the result of their studies as based upon recorded statistics and stated that concentrated large-scale operations result in abnormal price movements. This is true in 80 percent of the instances which they have on record. For example, last year wheat varied 27 cents in 2 days, because of a concentrated big-scale speculation. The markets do not advance because there are more purchases than sales, neither do they decline because there are more sales than purchases. The two are always equal.

Prices are influenced more by the manner in which purchases or sales are made and how the orders flow into the market and how they are executed. Excessive sales from a single source aggregating millions of bushels in the course of an hour exert a very much greater influence upon the price than the same volume of orders originating from widely different sources. Now this bill will prevent excessive and abnormal transactions which result in cornering the market, or which result from excessive large-scale transactions.

The bill also is directed against purely gambling transactions and against all of those dishonest schemes to which dishonest traders sometimes resort in order to trick a gullible public and prevent the producer from getting an honest price. The trader should not be allowed to deal with a marked deck. If he plays the game, he should play it honestly. Such things as "wash sales", "puts", "calls", "bucketing", and kindred things, are denounced by the bill. Cross trades and accommodation trades are likewise banned. Purely gambling transactions are prohibited, and the bill will prevent transactions which will cause any price to be registered or reported which is not a true and bona fide price.

I believe it was Bret Harte who told us in his famous poem about a game of cards that for "ways that are dark, and for tricks that are vain", the heathen Chinee is peculiar. So it is with gamblers who rob the public on the stock exchanges. They have many ways that are dark and many tricks that are vain. And this bill will prevent many of them.

My attention has been called to one carload of wheat that came in from the country to the Minneapolis market. This carload was sold and resold 57 times before it reached the miller. The trader had a good time with that car of wheat. It went through a peculiar ownership—from boss to bell boy, from manager to stenographer—and every time it changed hands somebody was fleeced. It is easy to guess that neither the producer nor the consumer made anything out of these fraudulent sales, and every time it was sold and in addition to the fraud that there was in it, you must remember that a commission was paid by somebody to somebody. The entire crop is sold hundreds of times each year. Who pays these commissions? Rest assured that they come out of the producer, and the farmer must pay for it in the end.

The bill does not go far enough. But it is a step in the right direction, and we should support it even though we believe that it should go much farther than it does.

The bill does not interfere with legitimate trading. It does not interfere, for example, with the practice of hedging. The bill has been misrepresented before the public, and I have friends in my district who have been disturbed about it. But there is nothing in this legislation that any honest man should object to it. It simply amends and perfects the Grain Futures Act in ways that will prove to be wholesome.

This bill is designed to operate against purely gambling transactions and against those things that are corrupt and dishonest, and it protects the public against them, even though it does not go the full length that many people desire.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] such time as he may desire.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, this bill, known as "H.R. 9623", is an attempt to curtail and restrict the activities of the grain exchanges by amending the Grain Futures Act. This object is sought to be accomplished by limiting short selling and speculation, also by licensing commission merchants who deal in commodities for future delivery.

It is the general belief that grain exchanges are necessary and are of real value in agricultural and commercial life. I do not share in this belief.

This bill creates a commission consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General. The commission is given power to fix limitations on speculative trading; also to prohibit cheating, fraud, and practices that are harmful and dishonest. It is the almost universal belief that the unbridled speculation in the exchanges, especially the stock exchanges, was largely responsible for the financial catastrophe of 1929.

The present law, the Grain Futures Act of 1923, has been almost a complete failure. It has no teeth. Under the present act the grain exchanges were supposed to regulate themselves. This they have not done.

The great wrong to the growers of grain is done when a few traders prevent an honest increase in the price which would have come because of a short crop, or, when they meet an active demand by selling for future delivery, millions and millions of bushels that never existed, thus beating down the prices to the farmers.

The commission can, under this bill, stop excessive selling of grain and allow the price to rise in accordance with the natural demand. Wash sales and fictitious transactions are prohibited, as they should be, and severest penalties are provided for such practices.

Legitimate hedging is allowed. By that I mean a flour mill may buy of a farmer or dealer 10,000 bushels of actual wheat for milling; then if that miller does not want to take chances on the possible fall in the market price of that wheat, he can sell in any legal exchange 10,000 bushels against the actual wheat bought. Under the proposed law it is lawful to seek protection against the future fluctuation in the market price of grain by buying or selling on the exchange.

This bill is to be known as the "Commodity Exchange Act" and includes all grain, also cotton.

I do not believe in the speculative market. If we cannot have elimination of speculation in food products, all of which is a hindrance to legitimate business, then I am willing to accept the best possible substitute, which is a controlled exchange.

The Chicago Grain Exchange is responsible for more ruined fortunes, more bankrupt grain merchants, than any other one agency. Man is a natural gambler; he wants to take a chance. By law we have sought to curb that tendency by prohibiting all lotteries, but we have allowed the grain exchange to run wild, luring its victims into its nets by the most dishonest of methods, and the result has been the bankruptcy of thousands of farmers, millers, bankers, and business men of every kind.

The worst feature of the grain exchange is the fact that as soon as the farmer or business man becomes interested in gambling on the future price of grain they nearly all find themselves incapable of transacting ordinary business. The grain speculator can think only of those things that will influence the future price. Those who control are able to dictate what the news shall be in the papers and other channels read or heard by the amateur speculator. In other words, those on the inside make most of the news fed to the public. The insiders often have power enough to influence the reports of the various branches of the Federal Government. The amateur speculator, like the farmer who sells his real wheat to buy paper wheat, has practically no chance. He is betting with the experienced speculator who is using loaded dice.

There are thousands of farmers in almost every State that date their financial ruin from the date they commenced operating on the speculating market.

I presume I am one of the few Members of the House who have actually dealt on the grain exchanges of San Francisco and Chicago. I have been a heavy raiser of wheat myself.

Many years ago I listened to the siren voice of the managers of the exchange and concluded that the right thing to do was to sell real wheat and buy paper wheat. This was the practice in places in the Pacific Northwest; and, almost universally, it meant that the money put into paper wheat was lost.

I have arrived at the place where I should like to vote for a bill absolutely prohibiting the trading in futures on exchanges. This is the best bill we can get at the present time.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will not the gentleman explain how this bill will affect trading operations on the market?

Mr. PIERCE. That would take more time than I have at my command, and I should like to leave it for the chairman of the committee to explain.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Does the gentleman not feel that there should be a provision in the bill prohibiting a person from selling or agreeing to sell that which he does not own?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TERRELL].

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I shall support this bill. I should like to see it amended, but I was told that it could not be amended as it was called up under a suspension of the rules. The amendment I would suggest would be on page 15, between lines 14 and 15, to insert the following:

That when any sale of any commodity is made for future delivery and the grades of the commodity are specified in the contract of sale, that actual and physical delivery of the commodity of such grade must be made at the time and place specified in the contract.

Any person violating this provision shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000, and each violation shall constitute a separate offense. In addition such person shall have his license suspended for a period of 1 year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to supplement the original Grain Futures Act that was passed in 1922. It is not a partisan measure at all. There was practically a unanimous report from the Committee on Agriculture. It is true that minority views were filed by one member of the committee, but that gentleman is not here today to defend his views; so, as far as I know, there is no active opposition to the enactment of the measure on the part of the committee. At the time the measure was reported there were only two votes against it in the committee, as I recall. The original Grain Futures Act was passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President. It was a new venture, and necessarily some features of it now require changing and strengthening. The present measure embodies recommendations which have been made by both Republican and Democratic Secretaries of Agriculture since the enactment of the Grain Futures Act. It is the result of the experience of the Department in the enforcement of that act and attempts to plug up some of the holes which have been found during the 12 years the act has been on the statute books.

The most important part of the pending bill is that which authorizes a board composed of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General to fix trading limits on the exchanges. I am not one of those who believes in abolishing boards of trade, at least not under existing conditions. I think that, properly regulated, they serve a useful purpose; and it would be a calamity to the farmers of this country, in my opinion, if, under present conditions, we did not have boards of trade. On the other hand, unless properly regulated, there is no doubt but what they do result in the manipulation of prices to the detriment of the producers of the country.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. As I understand the gist of the proposition it is to cut out speculative dealings on the various exchanges. Is not that the main purpose of the bill?

Mr. HOPE. It does not entirely cut off speculative dealings, and I do not think it would be wise to do that.

Mr. MILLER. It limits speculation within reasonable bounds.

Mr. HOPE. It does. Of course, there are valuable purposes served by boards of trade. One of them is to furnish a medium through which buyers and sellers can meet and reflect conditions of supply and demand. In the second place, they enable producers, dealers, and processors to maintain a system of price insurance, thus creating throughout the year a more stable market. If we had a market which was entirely free of manipulation, I do not think there could be any serious criticism; but the experience of the Department in administering the present law has shown clearly that where a dealer or a trader deals in an excessively large amount of any commodity it has a pronounced effect upon the price. The reports which have been issued by the Department of Agriculture, and there are several, clearly show this to be the fact. If any Members of the House are particularly interested in this question I would suggest that they read Senate Document No. 61 which goes into this matter quite briefly but thoroughly.

The purpose this bill would serve in giving the power to the board is to enable it, in its judgment and discretion, to fix trading limits above which traders cannot deal. This is, of course, an important grant of power, but we can admit, I think, in view of the fair administration which the Grain Futures Administration has given under the 1922 law, that it would exercise its discretion in this instance in the interest of the producers of this country.

I have not time to discuss even all the important provisions of the bill, but I call attention particularly to the fact that the bill has some features which have been requested by the cooperative farm organizations of the country. For several years there has been a controversy between the Chicago Board of Trade and certain cooperative organizations which have seats upon it. There has been a deliberate effort not only by the Chicago Board of Trade but others as well to prevent cooperative organizations from trading on the exchanges. This bill enlarges the rights of the cooperatives to trade on the exchanges and also provides a better and a different method for settling any disputes which may come up over these rights.

The bill also prohibits a number of practices which I think all traders on the exchange recognize as being inimical to legitimate business transactions. A good many of the matters which are contained in this bill are included in a code which the grain exchanges of the country recently adopted; but this code, of course, is only a temporary affair, and it was thought best to put these restrictions, many of which have the support of the better class of traders on the exchanges, into the form of permanent law.

The bill also provides for the licensing of commission men and pit brokers, thus giving some measure of control over those who do the actual trading.

The bill makes additions to the list of commodities now contained in the Grain Futures Act, the most important of which is cotton. For many years the cotton farmers of this country have been urging that there be some control of speculation in cotton. We have at this time what is known as the "Cotton Futures Act" but this act imposes very little restraint on trading in cotton futures. It has been administered by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. In this bill the regulation of all commodity exchanges including cotton is transferred to the Grain Futures Administration of the Department of Agriculture.

There has been a great deal of propaganda against this measure circulated by the boards of trade throughout the country, particularly the Chicago Board of Trade. It is the type of opposition and propaganda which was used in 1921 and 1922 prior to the enactment of the present Grain Futures Act. The dire predictions which were made at that time as to the results which would follow if that bill were passed have been proved false. There is no reason whatever for believing that the passage of this bill will in any way interfere with useful trading on the commodity exchanges or adversely affect anyone who has legitimate business there. The effect of this bill, in my opinion, will not be to prevent trading, but to make a broader market, one which is not manipulated, and a better market in which legitimate hedging transactions can be carried on. It will prevent a great many evil practices which are going on and which many members of boards of trade say they would like to have the opportunity of eliminating. In the end I think we can say that it will mark a forward step in the regulation of an institution which, if it is properly managed and regulated, can be made a benefit to the producers of agricultural products instead of a detriment, as has too often been the case in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this bill, no doubt, will affect the city of Chicago to a greater degree than it will any other city, and I fully appreciate that the 15 or 20 big grain manipulators, who have for years opposed any regulation, will dislike it; but I am satisfied that the legitimate trade and the commercial men, the exporters, and the general public will approve it, as it will surely inure to their benefit. This bill will not injure but will benefically affect legitimate dealers. It will only restrict the selling short of millions upon millions of bushels of grain, notwithstanding that the sellers never owned one bushel of it, just for the purpose of destroying the market and the prices. It will restrict the amount of trading as well as fluctuations, and no man who is not directly interested in this vicious and contemptible practice can object to as sane a bill as this.

For many years I have carefully pointed out that most of the dubious transactions on the board of trade have been by professionals, and if those transactions had not affected prices they would never have interested me, as I have no objections to a gentleman gambling, if he is so inclined; but what I have been endeavoring to prevent are these gambling activities affecting improperly the prices of grains or of any other commodity, which gambling, as a rule, militates against the best interest of the growers as well as the consumers.

During the last 5 years I have had several conferences with the gentlemen in charge of the board of trade and the stock exchanges and warned them that it would be for the best interests of the Nation, including their own, if they would restrict the gambling operations and the unnecessary fluctuations which have created uncertainty in the market and are invariably practiced solely for the purpose of hammering down prices.

In 1931 Congress created the Farm Board and appropriated $500,000,000 to purchase wheat and corn, which were then selling at an extremely low price, and to increase the farmers' sale price and stimulate the market. When the Farm Board stepped in to purchase large quantities of wheat to improve and stimulate prices paid farmers, these few manipulators sold short millions upon millions of bushels, thereby reprehensively destroying our honest efforts and causing a loss of millions of dollars to the Government. Therefore no one who has the interest of the Nation, especially that of the farmers, at heart can possibly have any sympathy for these complaining gentlemen, as they are not entitled to any.

I have stated many times on the floor that it matters not how many millions we appropriate, nor what other legislation we pass to aid the farmers, they will not avail if these selfish, avaricious gamblers are permitted to continue in their diabolical tactics and practices of selling short. This bill is by no means perfect, and it will not eliminate all abuses, but I am convinced that it will at least minimize and restrict them. The most unfortunate part is that these very gentlemen may transfer their activities to the Winnipeg and Liverpool markets, and I wonder whether the Committee on Agriculture has given any thought as to how that could be prevented, for, after all, the prices, no doubt, on these two exchanges will affect the prices to some extent in the United States. If after this bill becomes the law of our land I find that these speculators are trying to manipulate the Winnipeg and the Liverpool markets, I am positive I will be able to draft a law that will make it unprofitable for them so to do.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman wishes that the committee might have jurisdiction over Winnipeg and Liverpool. May I ask the gentleman if the committee and the administration do not now have jurisdiction over reclamation projects on which they are spending $300,000,000?

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman does not understand the principle of this bill.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman does not understand my question.

Mr. SABATH. Yes, I do. It is not a question.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman spoke of aiding the farmers.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman understood the principle of this bill and if he were interested in the farmers, he would not ask such a question. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask a question relative to this bill.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman has not answered the question.

Mr. SABATH. No; and I will not answer the question either, because I am not going to speak about reclamation. Some day when I have time I will talk to the gentleman about reclamation. I now want to explain the importance of this bill.

I want to call attention to the fact that this bill will do more for the good of the Nation, and especially for agriculture, than any piece of legislation that has been enacted.

I pleaded for some sort of legislation similar to this at least 12 years ago. In 1922, under a Republican administration, we did pass a grain futures bill, but it had no teeth. It could not be enforced and did not amount to anything. This bill before us today, although it does not go as far as I advocated, has some teeth and will prevent and stop "wash", "short", and fictitious sales and "puts and calls" and many other schemes by which the values and the prices of grains have been shamefully manipulated.

While the farmer is harvesting his wheat or grain, prices are hammered down to the extreme low point, but the moment the farmer parts with his grain the speculators start to raise the price and the result is that both the consumers and the farmers are mulcted by a bunch of professional, dishonest speculators, many of whom do not know the difference between wheat or barley, but still they sell millions of bushels of wheat, corn, or rye, just for the purpose of artificially lowering the price so that they can buy the grains back at a much lower price. These dastardly tactics have been followed from day to day and year to year to the detriment of the growers, legitimate dealers, and the public.

This bill will also aid the cotton growers in the South, and, in fact, all agriculturists throughout the United States.

I am, indeed, grateful that within 1 week from the passage of the stock exchange bill, which I also advocated for many years, I am to have the privilege of seeing united and salutary action taken by the House on this meritorious bill which, as I have stated, I am sure will do more good than any other piece of similar legislation ever enacted by the Congress.

I herewith give a résumé and explain the provisions of this bill:

First. The Grain Futures Act of 1922 has withstood every attack made against it in the courts. The pending bill proposes to change the title of the present law to the Commodity Exchange Act and adapt the present statute to apply to any commodity dealt in for future delivery, making it apply at this time specifically to wheat, cotton, rice, corn, oats, barley, rye, flaxseed, gain sorghums, and mill feeds (secs. 1, 2, and 3 of bill).

Second. The Commission created under the present Grain Futures Act consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General, is empowered to fix "trading limits" beyond which it will be unlawful to buy or sell futures for speculative purposes. Wide discretion is given the Commission to fix different limits for different commodities and different markets, and for selling and buying operations, and the Commission will have ample power to curb short selling. Hedging transactions are exempted and are defined in such a way as to make certain that these operations will not be interfered with (sec. 4a added by sec. 5 of bill).

Third. Cheating and fraud upon customers by exchange members, or by their employees or agents, in connection with the handling of orders, is made a criminal offense. Bucketing of orders and becoming the buyer in respect to selling orders, and vice versa, without the prior consent of the customer is made unlawful (sec. 4b added by sec. 5 of bill).

Fourth. "Indemnities" are outlawed, as are also "wash sales", "cross trades", and all transactions used to cause any price to be reported, registered, or recorded which is not a true and bona fide price (sec. 4c added by sec. 5 of the bill).

Fifth. Commission merchants who are intrusted with the funds of the public and receive orders from customers and the floor brokers who execute these orders on the exchange must be licensed by the Secretary of Agriculture (secs. 4d and 4f added by sec. 5 of bill).

Sixth. Margin moneys collected from customers must be safeguarded and not used to extend credit or to margin trades of any person other than the one for whom held. Such moneys are to be held and treated as trust funds, subject to deposit with other members or with the clearing house only as required to margin a customer's trades (sec. 4d added by sec. 5 of bill).

Seventh. Licensed commission merchants must display license or copy thereof in each office maintained by them in which orders are solicited, and must keep records and furnish the Secretary of Agriculture with information pertaining to their business as required (sec. 4e added by sec. 5 of bill).

Eighth. It is made unlawful to solicit orders or conduct any dealings in commodities for future delivery unless such orders and dealings are executed or consummated by or through a member of a contract market (sec. 4h added by sec. 5 of bill).

Ninth. It is made unlawful for any person to represent himself falsely to be a member of a contract market, or the agent of such member, in soliciting orders, or to represent falsely that orders are executed by or through any member of a contract market (sec. 4h added by sec. 5 of bill).

Tenth. Nonmembers as well as members of contract markets must report their transactions in futures direct to the Secretary of Agriculture when of a size required to be so reported by rule or regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture (sec. 4i added by sec. 5 of bill).

Eleventh. The Secretary of Agriculture may fix a date not earlier than the fifteenth of any delivery month beyond which contracts for the sale of any commodity for delivery during that month may not be made, and may require that the party making delivery shall furnish to the party receiving delivery written notice of delivery. Notice of delivery may be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture at not less than 3 nor more than 10 business days (sec. 4j added by sec. 5 of bill).

Twelfth. Contracts for future delivery must provide for the delivery of grades of commodities conforming to United States standards, if such standards have been officially established (sec. 4j added by sec. 5 of bill).

Thirteenth. Each exchange designated as a "contract market" must promptly furnish the Secretary of Agriculture copies of all bylaws, rules, regulations, and resolutions of such exchange, or the governing body thereof, and of all changes and proposed changes. Such exchange must allow inspection of its books and records and of its minutes and journals of proceedings and, when so directed by the Secretary of Agriculture, must require warehouses in which or out of which commodities are delivered on the futures contracts of such exchange, to make reports, keep records, and permit warehouse visitation as required by the Secretary of Agriculture (sec. 5a added by sec. 7 of bill).

Fourteenth. The power and authority of the commission named in the act is transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture in the matter of violations on the part of individuals, leaving unchanged the authority and jurisdiction of the commission with respect to contract markets and the revocation of contract market designations. The Secretary of Agriculture has authority to revoke the licenses of commission merchants and floor brokers for cause, subject to appeal to the courts (sec. 8 of bill).

Fifteenth. Further protection is extended cooperative associations by requiring their admission to membership and exchange privileges on order of the commission. The rights of such cooperative associations on an exchange are preserved pending appeal of any order to the courts (sec. 6a, added by sec. 9 of bill).

Sixteenth. In the case of a violation of the act by any exchange or its directors and officers, the commission, in lieu of revoking the contract market designation of such exchange, may issue cease and desist orders, which, if violated, will constitute a penal offense, subjecting the exchange or its officers to fine and imprisonment (sec. 6b, added by sec. 9 of bill).

Seventeenth. The Secretary of Agriculture is given power to issue and revoke licenses of futures commission merchants and floor brokers, to fix and establish fees and charges for the issuance of licenses and renewals, not to exceed $10, and may make and promulgate such rules and regulations as in his judgment are reasonably necessary to effectuate any of the provisions or to accomplish any of the purposes of the act. He is also authorized to publish the facts concerning any market operation, including the names of parties, which in his judgment is inimical to the market or against the interests of producers and consumers (sec. 8a, added by sec. 10 of bill).

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS AND AGREEMENTS

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 2817) to amend the act relating to contracts and agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, approved January 25, 1934.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act relating to contracts and agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act", approved January 25, 1934, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "The Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, and the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

By unanimous consent, a second was considered as ordered.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, we now have a statute under title 18, sections 204 and 205, that makes it a penitentiary offense and also providing for removal from office, for a Member of Congress to enter into a contract in which the Government is interested.

This applies to agricultural loans, including cotton and the hog and corn program. The matter was held up for a long time, and finally they passed a bill through the Congress providing an exemption so far as Congressmen are concerned.

When the statute was enacted it was never intended that it would apply to legitimate transactions, but only to cases where there was a question of profit to a Member of Congress involved in order to keep them from entering into contracts to sell Government property, and so forth.

It has now developed that they are applying this provision to the Home Loan Corporation and that they will make no loans to individuals or constituents where a Congressman holds the mortgage or where he is connected with an institution, directly or indirectly, that is making such a loan. Under the Home Loan Act if I happen to have a mortgage and I want to go ahead and accept bonds to help out a man to whom I have lent some money, I have to make a sacrifice in order to do it, just as everybody else, if it is honest and fair and legitimate, because I have to accept bonds at 3 percent instead of 5 or 7 or 8 percent.

Many of the Members of Congress, I am sure, did not know about this matter, and it has only recently been called to our attention that such transactions have occurred. There ought not to be any reason in the world why anybody would be opposed to this kind of a bill. The Department is not exactly demanding it, but I think I can speak with authority and say that the legal counsel of the Department is anxious that this should be done in order to save embarrassment both to the Congress and the Department. For instance, men are connected with banks either as directors or stockholders, and they are also connected, perhaps with building and loan associations. Suppose someone comes in and wants to borrow money. Simply because I happen to own some stock in one of these institutions, is there any reason why Bill Smith or Mary Jones, who may be a widow, should not borrow money or should not participate in the benefits of the Home Owners' Loan Act? Not a bit in the world. This is of no benefit to Congressmen, but it is of benefit to their constituents, and it will keep us from being embarrassed in protecting our people. I cannot understand why anybody would be opposed to this bill.

I do recall that this bill passed the Senate, it came over to the House and after it came over to the House it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. Why it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture I presume is because it amends the Agricultural Adjustment Act, but we passed a law exempting Congressmen from the Agricultural Adjustment Act with reference to this emergency proposition. The measure was reported back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. Since then no action has been taken, and since then an article appeared in a paper that this was for the benefit, especially, of Congressmen, allowing them to profit and receive benefits by it, and it has been lying dormant. I cannot understand why the measure should not be passed.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. FULLER. I gladly yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. The proposition has been put up to me in this way, as a reason why it should apply to Members of Congress. Say, for instance, you had a mortgage on a farm of mine and you sent an inspector to appraise it. The probabilities are that you had something to do with the appointment of the appraiser. Does not the gentleman think this might have some influence on the valuation he would put on the property which was to be the subject of a loan?

Mr. FULLER. I may say to the gentleman that I can conceive of such a thing happening, but I cannot conceive that a man who had such a standing in his community would be willing to resort to such tactics. I believe Congressmen are made of better material than that.

Mr. SNELL. That is a good, general statement.

Mr. FULLER. I believe it is a perfectly true statement.

Mr. SNELL. If a man living alongside of the man who got a loan did not get one, he might feel that the Congressman got a loan because he had some influence in appointing the appraiser to his position.

Mr. FULLER. Let me state the converse of that. I believe if a Member of Congress had a loan of that character to handle he would be mighty careful in going out there and recommending any loan at all, because he would be held personally responsible for it if he took any chance of a profit or any benefit in the world and, personally, you would not do it and hardly any of us would.

Mr. SNELL. It is not a question of profit, but a question of general feeling.

Mr. FULLER. Suppose you hold a mortgage on my place, I am not a Member of Congress, and you are willing to take the bonds and save foreclosure. Should I be barred simply because you own the mortgage? Should your friends be penalized simply because you were in Congress? I believe a Member of Congress is entitled to the same privileges of any citizen and no more.

Mr. SNELL. I think there is a little fine point there and it might be as well if we did not come in under this act.

Mr. FULLER. Section 208 never contemplated that it should apply in this case. It only contemplated where an agreement or where a Congressman made a contract that yielded some profit. This bill is only to relieve an embarrassing situation. There is nothing that can be directly or indirectly political. I cannot for the life of me see where anyone should oppose it.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Is not the gentleman from New York assuming a good deal when he says that a Democratic Congressman will have anything to do with the appointment of an appraiser in the Farm Loan Administration?

Mr. FULLER. I do not know about that.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If a Congressman holds a mortgage and is barred by the act, why cannot that Congressman relieve his constituent of that embarrassment by assigning the mortgage to a private person?

Mr. FULLER. Then he would be doing indirectly what he cannot do directly. And the law is that you cannot do indirectly what you cannot do directly. Why whip the devil around the stump?

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. TABER. There might be some question about a situation where a Member of Congress holds a mortgage on the property, but how can the gentleman justify a Member of Congress who profited from either one of these organizations?

Mr. FULLER. I am not justifying them.

Mr. TABER. Would not this bill permit it?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; it would permit it.

Mr. TABER. I do not think we ought to do such a thing as that and put ourselves in such a position. I do not think we ought to get in such a position.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it true that if a Congressman is director of a bank or loan association, under existing law that organization is barred from participating in contracts with the Government?

Mr. FULLER. According to the way they hold, he is. And it gets many men into trouble. It makes it a felony, and on conviction he is removed from office.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say that I think the gentleman's point is well taken. I think the law should not apply, or the home-loan law should not apply, to banks and organizations.

Mr. FULLER. I think because a man is a Congressman he ought not to be barred from what other people can participate in, if he does it honestly. Personally, I would not think of trying to borrow under this law, because it is an emergency matter.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. There possibly might not be any Members on the Republican side who would ever take advantage of this, but there might be some Democrats, if they happen to own farms. Something was said about Congressmen appointing appraisers. In my State, when an applicant for an appraiser's job went to the supervisors to be trained, and the supervisors were 9 Republicans out of 10, the first question asked was, "Are you recommended by a Democratic Congressman?" and if the answer was "yes", it meant curtains for that fellow, he had no chance of getting a job.

PERSECTION OF THE JEWS

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, one of the most priceless heritages of the American people is the principle of religious liberty established by the founders of this country. Many of them came to this land to escape the terrors of religious persecution practiced in the countries from which they fled.

When the Revolution ended and the American Republic was established, religious liberty was made one of its chief cornerstones. It was guaranteed by the Constitution and embodied in the laws of this Nation. It has contributed to the peace, happiness, and unity of this country and of the world.

Today this great principle is threatened. If we are loyal to it we cannot remain silent in the face of the persecution of the people of the Jewish faith by the Nazis. The founder of the Christian religion was a member of their race. They have furnished the world with many of its greatest statesmen, scholars, scientists, and musicians. They gave to England the great Prime Minister Disraeli. Two of the ablest members of the United States Supreme Court, Justice Brandeis and Justice Cardozo, belong to that faith.

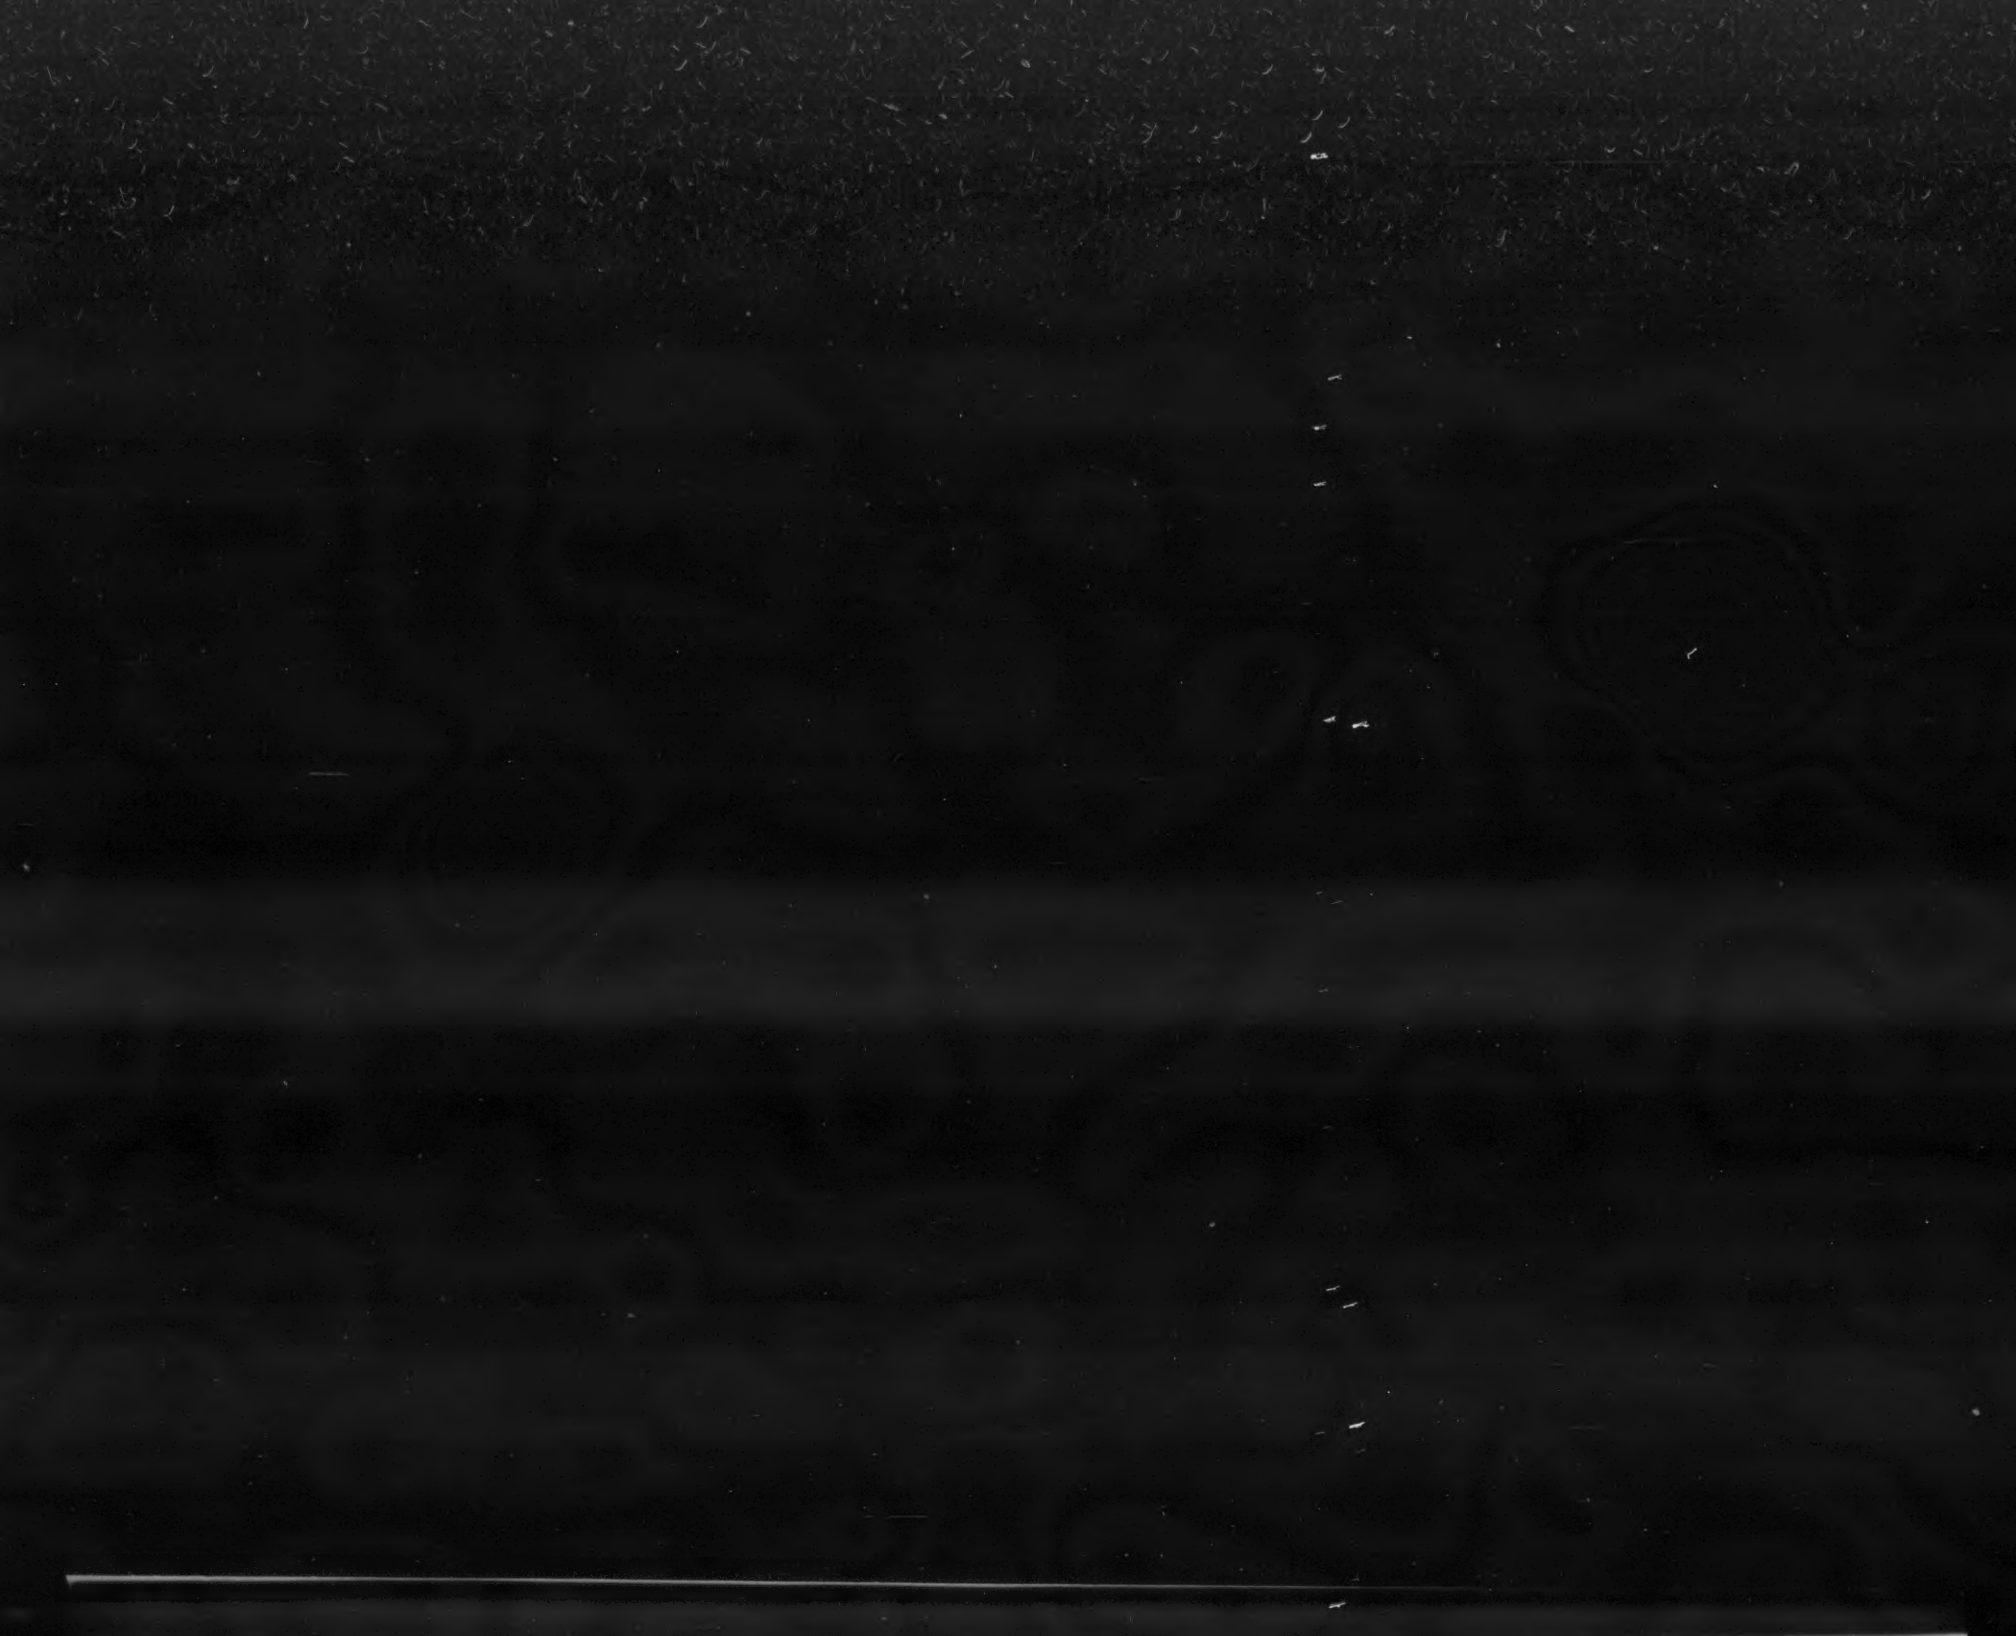
The Jewish people have no nation of their own. They must look to other races to protect their right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Wherever this fundamental human right is denied, no liberty-loving American can remain unmoved.

I wish to raise my voice in protest against what is happening today under Adolph Hitler and his misguided Nazi followers. Many of the outstanding citizens of that county are being imprisoned and persecuted. The great scientist, Einstein, has been driven into exile and his property confiscated. The United States has offered refuge to him and to other scientists and scholars who have fled to this country during the past year.

What is happening under Hitler today is a challenge to every civilized country. We have answered that challenge by once again making this land a place of shelter for those who seek religious liberty. We must answer it also by raising our protest against the injustice and the inhumanity of the persecutions that are taking place under the rule of the Nazis today.

THE VOLLBEHR BOOKS AND THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS COPY OF THE GUTENBERG BIBLE

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in that connection the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] is the sponsor for the measure that caused the purchase of the valuable books known as the "Vollbehr collection." He has references of the press and others made to that work and I think it will be well worth getting into the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] be permitted to extend his remarks and to put in those excerpts regarding that collection of books.



The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the Vollbehr collection of incunabula fired the imagination of the American people as few other things within the past decade. The word "incunabula", formerly scarcely known outside of the very small circle of bibliophiles and medievalists, is now in the vocabulary of millions of Americans. Perhaps it means the beginning of a renaissance for our country, which, having grown rich in the material things, is now beginning to yearn for culture and the spiritual values of life. With more and more leisure in the group of our citizens the use of books grows more universal and the cause of scholarship becomes more important.

The response from the press was to a large extent responsible for the interest manifested in these fifteenth century books. One cannot set forth the importance or the extent of public sentiment which crystallized in favor of the Government purchasing them without giving full credit to the newspapers of this country. It is indeed amazing the number of articles and editorials that appeared after the Representative from Mississippi introduced H.R. 6147. I shall not attempt to quote articles and editorials in full or even a small part of them, but I shall give excerpts from a few newspaper comments regarding the Vollbehr books and the Gutenberg Bible.

Evening Transcript, Boston: "These volumes of the babyhood of printing are not valuable merely as curiosities. They represent, probably, the most beautiful examples of the art of printing in existence. Printing was an art that started out brilliantly. Never, since its first century, has more careful attention been paid to the attainment of beauty in typography and presswork, and this, no doubt, for the reason that the earliest books had to compete in the public eye with manuscript books, and these had attained their maximum beauty. A Caxton—the work of the great English printer—is a work of beauty worthy of the careful study of any typographers; and we have a fair representation of Caxtons in this country."

The Publishers' Weekly: "No one can accurately estimate the value of these 3,000 books, but experts agree that the price asked is not more than half of its book-market value and that the price could only have been made because of Dr. Vollbehr's genuine interest in seeing this collection in a library where it would do the greatest possible good.

"The collection has been exhibited from time to time in various places and has proved its importance. Booksellers should join with the librarians in urging that this bill for its purchase by the Nation be passed."

George H. Sargent, the well-known author and bibliophile, wrote a letter to the editor calling attention to one or two errors that had appeared in the editorial of January 22. He called attention to the fact that Boston Public Library had very few incunabula, and so forth. I quote from his letter as follows:

But the common error into which the Transcript writer has fallen is that these books are valuable merely for their typography. These "cradle books" are chiefly valuable because in them is embodied the life and the thought of the people of the time. They are not merely theological, but deal with science, art, medicine, geography. Some of these books have been issued in new editions almost down to the present day, and books that have thus survived do not owe their long life to any typographical features. The Bibliothèque Nationale and the British Museum have perfect copies on vellum of the Gutenberg Bible. They are not likely to part with them, and if this country does not acquire the only other perfect copy of the three known copies, it may at some time in the future find itself in the position of the Emperor Tarquin, who bought the last of the Sibylline books on a rising market.

Winston-Salem (N.C.) Journal: "The value of these books is obvious. They should be in the Library of Congress. They are of distinct importance to research students, scholars, and the general reader who takes keen delight in examining books that are, as it were, milestones in the intellectual and literary progress of the race."

The Houston Press: "Strange to say there is no Gutenberg Bible in the Congressional Library, where one should be on exhibition. One Gutenberg was sold page by page to collectors throughout the world. The incunabula collection, or books from the birth or cradle days of printing, contains many other rare volumes. They are valued at over $3,000,000 by collectors. Congress has the opportunity to buy the volumes for $1,500,000 and some shudder at the suggestion that we invest such a sum in old literature in its original type, illustrations, and bindings.

"Those same Congressmen occasionally authorize the expenditure of $35,000,000 for one battleship. That's more than the cost of the Congressional Library and all the books stored there since its birth."

The Washington Post: "Because of the rarity and value of each volume in the collection, it is the hope of thousands of historians, librarians, printers, churchmen, philologists, antiquarians, book lovers, collectors, and literary people generally, that the world's outstanding collection of incunabula in private hands will find a permanent home in the Library of Congress, and that Congress should seize this opportunity to honor its Librarian, under whose administration the Library of Congress has grown in 30 years to its present value and dignity. Acquisition of the Vollbehr collection, which represents a cross-section of the thought and culture of the people of the fifteenth century, the Renaissance, the period contemporaneous with the beginning of the Reformation, and with the discovery of America, would enormously increase the prestige of the Library of Congress.

"Congress has sometimes refused to take advantage of opportunities to secure for the Library of Congress important and valuable collections of books and manuscripts. Its failure to acquire the library of George Washington, the original manuscript of Washington's Farewell Address, the Hartley papers, rich in American history, and the famous historical library of George Bancroft are shining examples of lack of foresight. Another unusual opportunity is now offered to acquire a collection that has no rival in the world. This opportunity to enrich the Nation's historical resources should not be ignored."

Morning Call, of Paterson, N.J.: "Probably never again will such an opportunity arise whereby this country will be offered an authentic vellum Gutenberg Bible along with 2,999 other fifteenth century books at such a price. Within a dozen years the appraised value of the book will have risen twofold, maybe threefold. Must we not all feel that there is no time like the present to consummate such a transaction? England and France are the only other nations owning complete vellum copies. Let America now step to the forefront in this as well as in all other worthwhile objectives and secure for herself, for all time, this choicest and scarcest and most famous of all books—the rarest Gutenberg Bible!"

Saturday Review of Literature: An article by Mr. E. Paul Saunders on the Vollbehr collection, which has already been inserted into the RECORD by Senator Bingham. I cannot refrain from giving Mr. Saunders' closing argument for the desirability of purchasing the Vollbehr collection:

"Congress should pass H.R. 6147 without a dissenting vote as a matter of national pride—pride in that, added to what we already have in the way of rare books (about 30,000 items, including about 1,600 incunabula, first editions, rare bindings, and some 10,000 early American pamphlets, manuscripts, and documents), acquisition of the Vollbehr collection would place the Library of Congress on an unquestionable parity with the national libraries of Europe, including particularly the famous British Museum and the Bibliothèque Nationale, at present the two leading libraries in the world.

"Let us have parity of scholarship as well as in ships, in culture as well as cruisers, in books as in battleships!"

St. Louis Post Dispatch: "The liberality of Congress has enabled the Library to acquire a vast and varied collection of rare books, pamphlets and documents, but Congress has missed some opportunities to acquire invaluable collections, such as the library of George Washington, the original manuscript of Washington's Farewell Address; the Hartley papers, rich in American history; all of which Congress refused to buy and has regretted its refusal ever since. The Vollbehr offer is probably the only chance that Congress will have to acquire for the Nation such a collection of invaluable incunabula. Certainly it is the only chance it will have of getting the Gutenberg vellum Bible. Its purchase will put the Congressional Library in the first rank among libraries.

"If the Nation can spend $40,000,000 for a battleship, it can certainly spend a million and a half for a collection of incunabula and classics which will have not only intrinsic value but an inestimable value to historians, students, scholars, and the art of bookbinding. The Library Building and land cost nearly $7,000,000, but its value is measured not by the cost of land and building but by the treasures it contains."

The Library Journal: "The library profession was represented in person by several librarians and the entire session was a compliment to the National Library as showing both professional and congressional appreciation of the rank which Dr. Putnam's administration has given to it. Those who spoke were among the best informed and the best noted in the field of incunabula, and that they journeyed from several parts of the country to urge favorable action is the best possible endorsement of Representative COLLINS' proposal. As 'parity' is now in the air, it may be observed that the acquisition of the third known copy of the vellum Gutenberg Bible by our own National Library will put it on a parity with the British and French national libraries, which have the other copies. It may be added that not only this inclusion makes the purchase an extraordinary bargain but that the acquisition by the Government of such a collection might serve to draw many a gift of similar material of a value ultimately beyond that proposed in this measure, collectors being prone to favor institutions whose application of their own resources indicates appreciation of such rarities."

Editorial in the Sunday Record, of Columbia, S.C., entitled "Honor to Mississippi", March 16:

Mr. COLLINS' speech is not only informing as to the Vollbehr collection, but it gives an enticing history of the Library of Congress. Among the entertaining sidelights are the expressions of disesteem with which Thomas Jefferson was held by some who opposed the purchase of his library in 1814. One Member opposed the purchase on the grounds that the books were "immoral, indecent, irreligious, and generally revolutionary." Another said that he was opposed to the dissemination of "the principles of a man (Jefferson) who had inflicted greater injury upon our country than any other except Mr. Madison."

But the Jefferson library of 7,000 volumes was purchased at a cost of $23,900.

The Vollbehr collection should be purchased. It is an opportunity that comes rarely, and maybe never again.

Hartford Courant: "Congress, to its later sorrow, has missed similar opportunities in the past, although on the whole its liberality has enabled the Library to acquire an immense and diversified collection of valuable books, pamphlets, and documents. Probably the present offer of Mr. Vollbehr is the only chance which we will be given to acquire this collection and to put the Congressional Library into the front rank among such institutions. So much money is expended annually on matters of less permanent value to the country that it would seem a great misfortune were we to neglect the chance to purchase something that not only has immediate and negotiable value but will add an inestimable prestige to our National Library."

Boston Evening Transcript: In the column entitled "The Bibliographer" appeared the following:

The present opportunity to make the Library of Congress of international importance for all time is one that ought not to be lost. If the Vollbehr collection is not secured for this country the men who bring this reproach to American culture and scholarship will go down in history, if their names are remembered at all, as those who put dollars before sense and who are directly responsible for losing to the Nation a collection "becoming more and more precious, more highly appreciable with the passage of time, imperishable in its influence on scholarship and the advancement of science and culture in the United States."

The other noticeable feature of this desiderate list is that it enumerates a very large number of Bibles, incunabula and classics, specimens of early printing, which are in the famous Vollbehr collection, a bill for the purchase of which is now before Congress. To have this collection come to the Library in its entirety would wipe out some of the most important items in the desiderate list. The Gutenberg Bible, of course, is the greatest of the items desired, and unless the copy of the Vollbehr collection is acquired now, the Library is not likely to have this foundation stone for the National Library.

Chicago Evening Post: "Practically the only times when citizens of a literary turn of mind are tempted to indulge in the well-know American indoor sport of 'writing to your Congressman' is when some misguided legislator introduces a bill for Federal censorship. It should thus be of particular interest to such citizens to know that there is at present before Congress a bill of another type and one which they may well urge their Representatives and Senators to support. The bill in question is one for the purchase of the Vollbehr collection of incunabula for the Library of Congress. You should write now if you are interested in having your legislators pause for a moment to devote to cultural purposes a sum small indeed compared to the millions appropriated annually for military, industrial, and political projects."

Publishers' Weekly: "The dramatic thing about the great Vollbehr collection of fifteenth century books is the fact that there is a copy of the vellum edition of the Gutenberg Bible in the collection. This book is of such inestimable value that the acquisition of the vellum copy by the Library of Congress is of national importance. Librarians and scholars gathered at the hearing to emphasize the importance of this collection to the Library; but, more than that, they helped by so doing to emphasize the importance of the Library of Congress itself, which is so steadily becoming not only a reference library but a housing place for treasures of inestimable value."

Public Ledger, Times-Picayune, the New York Evening Post, the Danbury News, the Democrat Chronicle of Washington, and other papers: Clinton W. Gilbert, in his column entitled "The Daily Mirror of Washington", has the following to say, among other things, about this collection:

Congress is showing more interest in this collection of rare books than it has been in the habit of showing in literary rarities. It neglected a century or more ago to buy for $2,500 the private library of George Washington. Similarly, in 1850, though urged to do so by Henry Clay, it neglected to purchase the manuscript of Washington's Farewell Address for $100. George Bancroft's very valuable library of Americana—books, manuscripts, and pamphlets, nearly 20,000 items—was allowed to slip into other hands, though offered for $75,000. So, too, the Hartley collection of Americana failed to interest Congress in 1860.

Times Union of Rochester, N.Y.: "This distinctly is an opportunity that Congress will never have again. In this collection are books that millions on millions of Americans will never see if they are not purchased by Congress. Representative COLLINS of Mississippi has seen the need of not only completing the Library of Congress but of bringing the books to the United States, where they may be seen and read. As he points out, they are not merely a collection of museum pieces, they are books necessary to education and culture."

Knickerbocker Press of Albany, N.Y.: "The Gutenberg three-volume Bible is valued at $1,000,000 by librarians and book experts everywhere. In a few years its value will be increased twofold. But the Bible and other books of the Vollbehr collection are offered to the Library of Congress for $1,500,000."

"This distinctly is an opportunity that Congress will never have again. In this collection are books that millions on millions of Americans will never see if they are not purchased by Congress."

In the Bethlehem Globe-Times, Librarian H. S. Leach, of Lehigh University, states in an interview:

There is no question whatever as to the authenticity and enormous value of the collection, and its purchase would put our National Library on a par with the best in the world. The price of $1,500,000 asked for the entire collection is regarded as an opportunity for the United States to improve the value of its library that is without parallel.

Waterbury Republican: "The situation of governmental finances is little different now, but the announcement in Sunday's papers that the cost of American participation in the World War has reached the stupendous total of $51,400,000,000, and that we shall pay this year the sum of $1,162,000,000 on account, brings up a matter of relative values. A million and a half dollars for culture and education seems a slight enough sum in contrast to the cost of the war.

"Book dealers have agreed that the Vollbehr collection is a bargain. It contains for one thing a Gutenberg Bible, which it is safe to say will some day bring a million dollars, in the rare event that one is ever offered for sale again. One of the chief arguments for the purchase of the collection is that it probably represents the last chance the Library of Congress will have to acquire this finest example of the printer's art and the first book to be printed with movable type. The other two known copies on vellum are owned by Britain and France and will presumably never be available.

"But the Bible is only one of 3,000 'cradle volumes' in the Vollbehr collection. It includes many works on religion, travel, science, philosophy, law, medicine, and orientalia, and many of the earliest printed editions of Greek and Roman classics. Not a few of the books shed a good deal of light on European conditions in the fifteenth century which resulted in the discovery and exploration of America. The Library of Congress should have the collection, and it is greatly to be hoped that Congress will see its way clear to appropriate the money."

Evening Star, Washington, D.C.: "They will be of interest and aid to students of the history of printing and to those engaged in other lines of research. The presence of that collection in the Library of Congress will bring Washington appreciably closer to the point of being the literary cultural center of the world."

Chattanooga News: "The Library of Congress is our national museum of literature. It should be the finest in the world. In point of numbers it is certainly one of the finest. It consists of 4,000,000 books and pamphlets, a million maps, a million pieces of music, over 70,000 bound volumes of newspapers, and many other pieces. It would be a source of pride to Americans to know that this great library would be crowned with the choicest book of Christendom."

Journal, of Auburn, N.Y.: "It is worth while for this Nation to take its mind off material things for a time. Possession of the Vollbehr collection would stimulate the interest of thousands of bibliophiles, librarians, printers, and art students. As a whole, the collection represents the cultural and artistic soul of the people of the Renaissance. Scholars would find it a rare field for research. Instead of going abroad, they could find in our Library of Congress some of the finest examples of early bookmaking. Foreign students would travel to America to study the collection."

The Punxsutawney Spirit: "With this wonderful collection added to its shelves the Congressional Library would take rank with the greatest in the world.

"America, with some semblance of justice, has been stigmatized as commercial and mercenary, a Nation of dollar worshipers, lacking culture and love for the beautiful in art, literature, and music. A country in which jazz is called music, and a vulgar display of wealth passes for aristocracy. The purchase by our Government of this incomparable collection of rare and priceless books would prove that we think of other things besides the accumulation of dollars. In the old days of rivalry for naval supremacy, Congress would spend $40,000,000 for a battleship without batting an eye. The bill to add this wonderful bibliographical treasure to the Congressional Library should be promptly passed."

Star Eagle, of Newark, N.J.: "The Vollbehr is the outstanding collection of incunabula in the world and its greatest treasure is the faultless copy of the three-volume Gutenberg Bible, printed upon vellum. Only three perfect copies of this work exist. The other two copies are in the British Museum and the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. The Gutenberg Bible in the Vollbehr collection has been called 'the choicest book in Christendom', but it is not by any means the only treasure which the United States has an opportunity to acquire for the Congressional Library. Of more than 40 percent of the books in the Vollbehr group, no single copy exists in America. It contains, among other things, copies of 20 of the known 32 fifteenth century books concerned with the discovery of America. More than 100 of the books were printed between the years 1455 and 1470, in the very infancy of the art of printing."

Courier, Waterloo, Iowa: "The Vollbehr collection, acknowledged the outstanding one of its kind in the world, numbers 20 of the 32 known books of the fifteenth century published regarding the discovery of America; while of more than 1,200 of its titles no single copy exists in America."

Boston Post: "Let America now step to the forefront in this as well as in all other worthwhile objectives, and secure for herself, for all time, this choicest and scarcest and most famous of all books—the rarest Gutenberg Bible."

Philadelphia Inquirer: "Favorable action will make these rarities accessible to scholarship, affording first-hand information on historical subjects. Since the period includes the Renaissance and the discovery of America, the volumes cover an important epoch of civilization. The material will be available to correct errors in modern works, many of whose authors never went to original sources to verify their data. How important is the task of checking up may be indicated when one remembers that much of what passes for familiar knowledge in our schools is really based on slender evidence.

"Dating back to the beginning of the art of printing, the Vollbehr collection offers possibilities of checking up on an important age."

Boston Herald: "Here is a chance to place the Congressional Library at a single stroke on a plane of parity at least with its only rivals in the world. We should make the most of it. As Elihu Root has said: 'The possession of such a collection would give distinction to our Library and it would not be treated as a second-class institution.'"

Indianapolis News: "But this Vollbehr library of 3,000 volumes is rich in all departments of learning—classic, patriotic, scientific, and law. Nor are the books mere 'museum pieces' for many, if not most of them, are of the highest value to scholars and research workers. The price is, as one of the experts says, 'amazingly' low for a literary and art treasure of inestimable value, and our great Library would be the poorer without having had the chance to acquire it. It is no question of having a national library, but rather one weather, having it, we shall see it is kept up to the very highest standards.

Ernest Boyd in the New Freeman: "It has always amused me to observe the contortions of governments when confronted with the opportunity for useful expenditure, out of which no party kudos can be extracted. How it hurts when someone suggests that a great work of art, or a rare library ought to be purchased by the Nation and placed in some appropriate public institution.

"We are forever hearing lamentations over the failure of this government or that to acquire for the nations works which must otherwise be sold to the highest bidder and thereby withdrawn from general consumption. On no occasion does the amount involved approach that casually spent upon pretty devices for the destruction of human lives and it is such evidences that men have gradually accumulated to prove that they are not necessarily swine. I shall not attempt, with my unarithmetical mind, to calculate how much $1,500,000 would cost us per person in proportion to the wealth and population of the taxpayers of the United States.

"Nevertheless, our legislators will hesitate over the Vollbehr collection, as the legislators of other countries almost as wealthy have hesitated in analogous circumstances. Ces Messieurs suddenly become frightfully aware of their responsibilities to the taxpayer. When they have saved him from rashly becoming the owner of a Gutenberg Bible, they feel that they have not lived in vain and have deserved well of their constituents. The National Treasury must not be bankrupted by Jeffersonian scoundrels; let the latter leave that to their inferiors, who know how and when to do it, without arousing the apprehensions of the plain people. Let who will buy the Nation's literature, provided we vote for their battleships, is their happy thought. There is more rejoicing over the launching of one cruiser than over the purchase of ninety and nine works of immortal beauty."

Milwaukee Journal: "Congress should not miss the opportunity to bring to this country a collection so rich in history, literature, and the art of printing that, while its value must of necessity be measured in dollars, it is really priceless."

Daily Clarion Ledger, Jackson, Miss.: "There is now pending before Congress H.R. 6147, introduced by Congressman Ross COLLINS, of this State, which would appropriate $1,500,000 to purchase the Otto H. F. Vollbehr collection of 3,000 volumes 'cradle books'—so called because printed in the infancy of the 'art preservative of arts.'

"Under terms of this bill the collection would be acquired for the Nation and be deposited in the Library of Congress and remain a part thereof, to be known as 'the Herbert Putnam collection of incunabula.'

"This bill and the part taken in its passage by Congressman COLLINS have created a great deal of attention throughout the country and have received the general approval of the leading editors of the Nation.

Miami Herald: "The proposition is not a question of mere money. The volumes have a rare and intrinsic importance. They would be a priceless source of information for those who cannot go to Europe to consult references. The collection contains works on religion, astronomy, medicine, natural science, law, geography, cosmography, chess, cookery, history, matrimony, philosophy, customs, travel, bibliomania, temperance, military and naval sciences, printed in English, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, French, Chinese, Slavonian, German, or Spanish. It is twice as large as any single American collection except the Huntington.

"America has scrapped on occasions a single battleship representing many times the sum asked for this collection. Its possession would symbolize our desire for parity in culture as well as in cruisers."

Brooklyn Citizen: "An interesting feature of the great Vollbehr collection is a copy of the Gutenberg Bible on vellum, which is one of the only three perfect copies in existence. Edward F. Stevens, librarian of the Pratt Institute of Free Library of Brooklyn, discussing the collection, says: 'The three-volume Gutenberg Bible, printed upon vellum XXX included in this collection, itself awakens eager and jealous desire that its permanent home shall be in the United States in its National Library, where the people may behold it and take pride in it forever. Only two other faultless copies of the Gutenberg Bible printed upon parchment exist, one in the Bibliothèque in Paris and one in the British Museum. America should own the third. Dr. Vollbehr's copy not only equals the other two in perfection but is the only vellum specimen extant in three volumes. This copy has been described as the 'choicest book of Christendom.'"

Portland Evening News, Portland, Maine: "'This Vollbehr collection could not be duplicated', says Dr. George P. Winship, of Harvard, a leading authority on incunabula, 'now or at any time in the future for any amount of money * * * The opportunity is in every way exceptional. * * * It will never again be possible to bring together another collection remotely comparable to this one.'"

"An so testify all authorities on incunabula in the country. The collection is offered the Library of Congress because only such a library has the ability to pay the price, and because Dr. Vollbehr wishes his collection to be kept in its entirety.

"This opportunity to acquire for the people of the United States such a priceless collection at so really small a price will never come again. It is literally an opportunity of a lifetime—of a century. An unanimous vote for the bill seems in order."

Chicago Daily Tribune: "In Europe conservation policies mean not alone the salvage of natural resources but the rescue of the great works of human hands and minds from the destruction of scattering that time imposes on them. Though America has fewer works of time and of tradition available for saving, she has more money to save what there may be. As a memorial to Carl Schurz, Dr. Otto H. F. Vollbehr, of Berlin, presented his collection of 20,000 early woodcuts to the Library of Congress more than a year ago. His incunabula (cradle books) printed in the infancy of printing are now available at one-half their appraised value. The great Gutenberg Bible, incunabulum incunabulorem, alone makes this a national investment well worth the cost."

The Commonweal: "One bill regarding which there could be no difference of opinion was introduced some time ago by Representative Ross A. COLLINS of Mississippi. Indeed, if it were not for the dictates of economy the matter would have been taken care of in a jiffy. A famous German collector of books, Dr. Otto Vollbehr, presents for sale to the United States Government for the Library of Congress his accumulation of incunabula, as books printed during the early days of the art's history are termed. One item is a unique three-volume Gutenberg Bible—absolutely the only one of its kind in existence, and held to be worth a round million dollars. Dr. Vollbehr offers his entire library, 3,000 volumes, at $500 apiece, which figure is absurdly reasonable."

Editorial in the Nation of May 21: "A million and a half dollars is the comparatively trifling sum asked of Congress for the purchase, for the Library of Congress, of the Vollbehr collection of incunabula. Nor could this sum, about a tenth of the cost of a new cruiser, be spent in any more worth-while or satisfactory manner. Three thousand books comprise the collection, 40 percent of the titles not being represented at all in the United States today.

"There is every reason to believe that Congress will be willing to appropriate money for the purchase of these books. Its policy toward the Library of Congress has been, on the whole, farsighted, generous, and intelligent.

"In determining appropriations for the Library, Congress has made several bad slips, which have been regretted ever since by persons aware of their significance. Now it may make up for these unfortunate mistakes by appropriating without delay funds for the purchase of the unique and invaluable Vollbehr collection. When we consider the vast sums that are discussed for the 'limitations of armaments', a mere million and a half seems little indeed."

Times-Picayune, of New Orleans: "It is not without interest to note that the Member of Congress who drew the measure now before our legislators, and whose speech in advocacy of his proposal was an outstanding address of the current year, was not from Boston, New York, Washington, or other literary center, was not from the North, even, but from our own next-door State, Mississippi. In short, this earnest advocate of a great literary acquisition was the Honorable Ross A. COLLINS, of the Fifth District. Purchase of the Vollbehr books will come up in Congress for action at a later date, and the collection, if acquired, will place us, incunabulistically speaking, on a par with the nations of the Old World."

Hartford Courant: "The Library of Congress, center of the Nation's historical and intellectual heritage, should not be denied these books. If Congress persists in being dilatory in the matter, the collection will be broken up and sold at auction in Europe. Immediate action is necessary. The matter should be decided at this present session, else the chance may be gone forever."

Bookman: "The keynote of the whole collection is, of course, the Gutenberg Bible on vellum, one of the three known perfect copies, the others being firmly anchored in the British Museum and the Bibliothèque Nationale. Readers of Roman history may remember the story of the Emperor Tarquin who refused to buy the nine Sibylline books offered to him, and who in the end paid the same price for the last three of them after the Sibyl had destroyed the other six. History, it is said, repeats itself."

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS AND AGREEMENTS

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I hate to see this bill come up here in this shape. Frankly it makes Members of Congress eligible borrowers from both the Farm Loan banks and the Home Loan banks, and I can conceive of nothing that will bring Congress into more dispute than to pass such a bill. I do not see how we can go back home and face our constituents after passing such a bill. The rulings of the Comptroller General do not bar dealing with the Government by corporations in which Members of Congress happen to hold a small amount of stock. It is not necessary from any such standpoint as that. I don't believe there will be serious objection to passing a bill which would permit one of those organization to take over small mortgages or something of that kind, but for Members of Congress to go out and borrow directly on property that they own from either of these organizations I think is absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. FULLER. The gentleman should understand that this does not apply to farm land, this applies on the Home Loan Bank business. They can only accept bonds at 3 percent. It does not apply to the farm loan, because that is not a Government agency.

Mr. TABER. The report of the committee says that the amendment is to add the words "The Federal Farm Loan Act as amended and the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933." That would bring farm loans under it.

Mr. FULLER. That is correct.

Mr. TABER. I don't see why we should take any chances of that kind and bring the House of Representatives and the Senate into disrepute. [Applause.] I think we ought to vote this bill down in the shape in which it is presented.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, a general statute prohibits a Member of either body entering into a contract with the Government.

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Why should we make an exception for this specific purpose at this time?

Mr. TABER. I can see no reason except to benefit Members of Congress.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In view of the statement the gentleman made, that the Comptroller General had ruled that where a Member of Congress owned a small amount of stock in a corporation, the corporation was not prevented from contracting or dealing with the Government, I do not see how the Comptroller General could so rule, because section 206 does pertain to any corporation and as I interpret that and have so advised people I believe that if a Member of Congress owned all of the stock of a corporation, that corporation would not be prevented from dealing with the Government.

Mr. TABER. I think that is true.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not want the RECORD to indicate anything to the contrary.

Mr. TABER. I used the expression "small amount of stock", because they were the words the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] used. I think the gentleman is right, that it does not apply to a corporation in any way.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that section 206 of the criminal code, which is the section referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], provides:

> That nothing contained in sections 204 and 205 of this title shall extend or be construed to extend to any contract or agreement made or entered into or accepted by any incorporated company, where such contract or agreement is made for the general benefit of such corporation or company, nor to the purchase or sale of bills of exchange or other properties by any Member or Delegate to Congress or Resident Commissioner, where the same are ready for delivery and payment therefor is made at the time of making or entering into the contract or agreement.

Mr. TABER. It is not only clear as to that, but I should say that the last part of the language that the gentleman read would take care of any small mortgage or anything of that kind turned into those corporations.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. If the principle of allowing a Member of Congress to enter into a contract with the Government was wrong, we should try to change it entirely, but not just change it for this special law.

Mr. TABER. There is no question about it. We ought not get ourselves into trouble by passing such a law as this.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman should not lose sight of the fact that both of these acts were passed in the interest of the distressed home owner and the distressed farmer. With this ban in the law as it is now, the farmer or home owner who has a loan that is held by a Member of Congress or is held by any institution in which a Member of Congress is interested, cannot receive any relief whatever under either the Federal Home Loan Act or the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. TABER. I do not think the gentleman understands the law.

Mr. ARNOLD. If we look at this from the standpoint of the home owner or the farmer, this ban should be removed.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will listen, I will read this statute:

> SEC. 206. Contracts not affected. Nothing contained in sections 204 and 205 shall extend to or be construed to extend to the purchase or sale of bills of exchange or other property by any Member of or Delegate to Congress where the same are ready for delivery and payment therefor is made at the time of making or entering into the contract or agreement.

That would except a mortgage which was to be turned over to this corporation. There is no question about it. That is what the law says.

Mr. ARNOLD. But the departments have ruled otherwise.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Those sections of the Criminal Code, 202 on, were adopted in 1909, as I recall it?

Mr. TABER. That is correct.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, they did not anticipate the situation that exists today. What they had in mind was a Member of Congress being directly interested, although they say indirectly, in a contract with the Government. It has been held, for instance, that where a general contractor has a contract with the Government, a Member of Congress, interested in a subcontract on that general contract, is not prohibited by these sections. These acts did not anticipate the situation we have today. Does the gentleman really think that the Government would suffer any if a mortgage were made on the home or farm of a Member of Congress?

Mr. TABER. I think we would be a great deal better off if we did not get into that sort of thing.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not personally interested.

Mr. TABER. I think for the protection of Members of Congress, we would be much better off if we did not take any chance.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Should we open this door and permit Members of Congress to be dealing in this character of securities?

Mr. TABER. I think we should not.

Mr. DOWELL. Should we not oppose this bill and should not this bill be defeated?

Mr. TABER. I think it should be.

Mr. DOWELL. There is no real call for it that I know of, and I hope it will be defeated.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill amends a bill which we passed earlier in this session, which provided that the provisions of law which have been referred to here, prohibiting Members of Congress from contracting with the Government, should not apply to contracts entered into under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I think there was a very good reason for making an exception of those contracts, because with that prohibition in the law it prevented Members of Congress from cooperating with the agricultural program of the Government. There are a great many of them who are producers of agricultural products. They were perfectly willing and anxious to cooperate and could not do it. It was certainly setting a bad example, if nothing else, to the other farmers of this country who were urged to go into these various allotment contracts for Members of Congress not to cooperate. So I think there was a very good reason why that legislation was proper. But here we have an entirely different situation.

Mr. FULLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. FULLER. Does the gentleman not think there are Members of Congress who want to cooperate on this home loan law, who own mortgages, that have people who want to borrow, where they will have to take a sacrifice by taking bonds. Does the gentleman not think that situation prevails all over this House?

Mr. HOPE. I do not know why it would be called cooperation for a Member of Congress to apply for and get a loan on his home or his farm. I do not consider there is anything cooperative about that. Especially is this true when we recall that the total amount which can be loaned is limited and that it is those in financial distress who are supposed to be benefited.

Mr. FULLER. That is not what I asked the gentleman.

Mr. HOPE. That is what this bill provides, that Members of Congress can borrow from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and from the Federal land banks. If we pass this bill that is the word that will go out to this country, that we have changed the law and Members of Congress can enter into contracts with the Government to that extent.

I think there is a sound reason why Members of Congress should not enter into contracts with the Government, and it certainly should apply to farm loans and home loans just as much as to any other beneficial contract.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question purely for information?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The suggestion has been made that under the present construction of some department of the Government, parties who are distressed and who are seeking to secure an adjustment of their obligations under the present law are prevented from availing themselves of it because some Member of Congress might incidentally hold stock in the loan association to which application is made, and situations of a similar nature. Is this true?

Mr. HOPE. I do not know of any such ruling.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That seems to be the real basis of merit for this proposition.

Mr. HOPE. If there is any such regulation it is contrary to both the letter and spirit of the law. The section which I read to the House a short time ago shows this very clearly.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. FOCHT. I hear a great deal of opposition raised on account of the likelihood of Congressmen borrowing money from institutions conducted by the Government. I should like to know how many Members there are in the House at this minute who are not now carrying loans for money borrowed from a State or Government institution—a national bank. Is there any difference between borrowing money from a Farm Loan Board or the home-loan bank and a national bank holding a charter from the National Government, examined by national inspectors, accountable to the Government? I do not see the consistency of the objection to the pending bill. I think it is a most meritorious bill; I think we are casting reflection upon ourselves when we say Members of Congress did not have the same right to borrow from the Farm Loan Board that they have to borrow from national banks. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. A national bank is not a Government institution. It is a private corporation chartered by the Government of the United States. The pending bill proposes to permit Members of Congress to borrow directly from and to make contracts with certain governmental agencies which they cannot do under existing law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say to the Members of the majority side particularly, that just a few days ago a news story went out from one of the Washington press services regarding this bill. It was intimated in that story—I do not know how much fact or how much fiction there was to it—it was intimated that someone down at the White House was waiting for this bill with an ax. I do not know, perhaps the author of this interesting item was mistaken; it might be mentioned, however, that in the past the information sent out by this press service indicates that the author either knows what is going on or has an almost uncanny ability to guess correctly.

If we pass this bill we are going to put ourselves in the questionable position of voting to permit Members of Congress to make contracts with the Government. It will not add any to the credit of this body.

Mr. DOWELL. And for that reason it should be beaten.

Mr. HOPE. I think so.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOPE) there were—ayes 65, noes 43.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I also make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 185, answered "present" 3, not voting 99, as follows:

PUEBLO LANDS OF SAN DIEGO

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H.R. 3084) authorizing the sale of portions of the Pueblo lands of San Diego to the city of San Diego, Calif.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the nature of this bill?

Mr. BURNHAM. It has reference to the matter of a right-of-way through Government property. The War Department has passed favorably on this matter, and, as a matter of fact, the road is already built.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does it cost the Government anything?

Mr. BURNHAM. This is one case where the Federal Government will get something out of the matter. The city of San Diego will pay the Federal Government $50. I have the report of the committee here if it is necessary to read it.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, is authorized to sell to the city of San Diego, Calif., approximately eight hundred and seventy-five one-thousandths of an acre of Pueblo lots 281 and 305 of the Pueblo lands of San Diego for a public street, subject to such conditions and limitations as he may impose to safeguard the interests of the United States, for the sum of $50 and pay the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ARBITRATION—UNITED STATES AND TURKEY

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House Joint Resolution 295, authorizing appropriation for expenses of representatives of the United States to meet at Istanbul, Turkey, with representatives of Turkish Republic for purpose of examining claims of either Government against the other and for expense of proceedings before an umpire, if necessary.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $90,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for participation by the United States in the examination and settlement at Istanbul, Turkey, or before an umpire, if necessary, of the claims presented by either the American or Turkish Government against the other, including personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and rent of offices and rooms for the use of the American representatives, in addition, if deemed necessary by the Secretary of State, to the lawful per diem, stenographic reporting and translating services by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 41, sec. 5); traveling expenses; purchase of law books and books of reference; printing and binding; official cards; entertainment; expenses or honorarium of a neutral umpire in the event such an appointment is found desirable; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which payments may have been made for any of the purposes herein specified: Provided, That any expenditures from the amount herein authorized to be appropriated shall become a first charge upon any moneys received from the Turkish Government in settlement of the respective claims and the amount of such expenditures shall be deducted from the first payment by the Turkish Government and deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts: And provided further, That the Secretary of State, in distributing to the respective claimants the balance of the amounts received from the Turkish Government, as provided by act of Congress approved February 27, 1896 (29 Stat. 32), shall apportion the amount withheld, as above provided, in such a manner as to constitute a uniform percentage of deduction from the amount found to be due each claimant.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BAKEWELL and Mr. BLANTON demanded a second.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the committee and demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut demands a second and will be recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution merely provides for the authorization of $90,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of paying for an arbitration of certain claims of citizens of the United States against Turkey. These claims arise on behalf of American citizens, some 2,500 of our people being involved, from the seizure of American property, personal injuries, and property losses resulting from the deportation of American citizens and losses resulting from the Smyrna fire of 1922.

There was an agreement entered into between this Nation and Turkey in 1922 providing for a committee by which they hoped to settle these claims. Ratification of the treaty between the United States and Turkey was not finally made until 1933. Under this agreement the United States of America appointed two local men as the representatives of this Government in undertaking to reach some agreement as to these claims. They were unable to do so, and it became necessary for the Secretary of State through the President of the United States to get an extra agreement for an arbitrator.

It was necessary under this agreement that a representative of this Government should be sent to Turkey, and he has already been sent there by the President. Judge Neilson was sent over there by the President as our representative, and he now asks favorable consideration for an authorization to pay expenses. This is not an appropriation. If it does not require this amount the Appropriations Committee have the right to pass upon the amount that should be appropriated. This bill provides further that all amounts collected for our citizens shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and then a deduction shall be made from the amount collected to pay the expenses to which this Government has been put, and a pro rata part of the balance to be given to the individuals involved.

This request is made through the Secretary of State, and also through the President of the United States, because he has already sent a man there for this purpose.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand the commission is over there now doing this work and there is no money to pay them?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is correct. This had to be done on account of the treaty.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And the Government will be reimbursed for any expense to which it might be put from the first payments on these claims?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes. These claimants are scattered all over the United States. I could give you the number in each State, but I will merely call attention to the largest numbers. The claims amount to something like $20,000,000, and there are approximately 2,500 claimants in the United States.

When I called on the State Department to furnish the residence of these people, 905 of these claims had already been sent to Turkey, and they were unable to give the States from which they came. However, the claimants came from Alabama, Arkansas, 168 from California, 25 from Connecticut, the District of Columbia 29, Illinois 87, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts 236, Michigan 228, and various other States. There are also claimants from New Jersey, 20; New York, 386; Ohio, 19; Pennsylvania, 77; Rhode Island, 59; and 17 from Wisconsin.

I call attention to this in order to let the Members know that these are your citizens who are involved, and we are asking an adjustment and adjudication of these claims. The United States is undertaking to make this adjudication, not at the expense of the United States, but the amount collected, as I stated before, is to be placed in the Treasury, then paid out.

It has not been long since we had this treaty, and Turkey is living up to it faithfully. If they had not lived up to their treaty we would not have Insull today locked up in Illinois to answer the charges of the people against him for defrauding them of millions of dollars.

You know that when he escaped from Greece and landed in Turkish waters they went out and seized him, and they are responsible for bringing that man to justice in this country. It is therefore absolutely necessary that we should keep our agreement and our treaty with these foreign nations.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not also true that in presenting claims against other nations the United States has collected a large amount of money?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. We have many cases in which this same situation exists. These matters have been arbitrated and the amounts have been collected. I can give the Members of the House a list of these arbitrations if it is desired.

Mr. BAKEWELL. I think it would be helpful if the gentleman would give us these figures, because that furnishes the information upon which objection has been raised to this bill.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It has been stated on this floor that none of these arbitrations ever amount to anything; that we never collected anything, and for that reason this resolution should not be approved.

I called on the State Department a few days ago for the papers in reference to that matter, and, not going back very far, they furnished me instance after instance where this Government has collected money and in some instances taken out the cost of collection and paid the citizens, just as they are proposing to do now. For instance, Austria and Hungary, arbitration against Austria, three-hundred-and-seventy-thousand-and-odd dollars; Hungary, $172,619, paid, so I am advised; China, $887,000 plus, paid; Charles J. Hanna against Cuba, $350,000; Germany, $265,000,000, which is being paid, and bonds are there to protect the interests of our people, and 1 percent is being taken out for the expense; Great Britain, an arbitration involving millions of dollars; and also Guatemala, and an arbitration with Mexico, which has not yet been determined, and one each with Panama and Sweden. These are a few of the instances where arbitration has taken place and our country has received the benefit of it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand we have similar delegations or commissions in each of these countries collecting or trying to settle these private debts?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not know about the particulars, but in some cases I know they have.

Mr. SNELL. These are all private debts against Turkish citizens and also against the Turkish Government?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes; the Turkish Government.

Mr. SNELL. And there is a pretty good chance of realizing on most of them?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I could not say about most of them. There is about $20,000,000 involved and they hope to get quite a good deal for our people.

Mr. SNELL. And as I understand from the Department, the first money collected goes to pay the expense of collection?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Every cent that is collected goes into the Treasury and the expense is taken out and the pro rata part paid to the claimants.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And the expense would not be more than $80,000 or $90,000.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes; and I can hardly see how it would be that much, because in the report of Secretary Hull he states that he is going to use at least two men who are over there in the Department.

I may also say that this is a unanimous report from our committee.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I have not had an opportunity to examine either the report or the bill. Are there any counterclaims on the part of Turkey?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. There are no counterclaims filed by Turkey, and the time for filing has expired.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I take it this is the most effective and the most practical way to accomplish something for our citizens and for our own country?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It is absolutely the only way that is left us.

Mr. McCORMACK. And out of any money that is collected the United States Government is reimbursed this sum?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Absolutely.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I gladly yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Is there any obligation on the part of the Government of Turkey to pay anything if the awards are made?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I understand there is, under the agreement that was signed and approved.

Mr. TABER. I have just been reading this letter from the Secretary of State, and I may be mistaken about it, because I had not seen it before a moment ago, but it rather seems to me there has just been an exchange of notes and there is no ratified treaty which would be binding.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is absolutely wrong. The treaty has been ratified. They first tried to settle this by a lump sum, but they could not agree on it, and then ratification was exchanged between the nations.

Mr. TABER. It states here that they have had an exchange of notes which took place on August 15, 1933.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am very sorry, but I cannot take up more time. The exchange of ratification has been made by both nations. The gentleman is referring to the meeting of the committees.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BLANTON and Mr. BAKEWELL rose.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on the question of who demanded a second, may I state that the gentleman from Connecticut, a member of the committee, demanded a second and his demand was granted.

Mr. BLANTON. The Speaker recognized me to demand a second, and I demanded it.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Texas a member of the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. No, Mr. Speaker; but I was the one who demanded a second, and the Speaker recognized me and a second was considered as ordered without objection. I was the one who demanded a second, and this is a bill I have been fighting here for several months.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a member of the committee has preference.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman did not demand it and did not get recognition from the Speaker. The gentleman should have demanded this at that time. I was the one who got up and demanded a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Connecticut was on his feet.

Mr. BLANTON. I was the one who demanded a second, and the Speaker recognized me.

Mr. BAKEWELL. I demanded a second as a member of the committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I thought I heard the Speaker state that the gentleman from Connecticut would have 20 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. No; the Speaker never said that. The gentleman from Connecticut is for the bill. I was the one against the bill the Speaker recognized, and the Speaker immediately said, "Without objection, a second is considered as ordered." There was no time nor anything else mentioned.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a member of the committee should be recognized. The Speaker is advised that the gentleman from Connecticut was on his feet, and the Chair thinks the gentleman should be recognized.

Mr. BAKEWELL. I shall be very pleased to yield the gentleman from Texas 5 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman. That is what I was going to give the gentleman; in fact, I was going to give him 10 minutes, had he been against the bill. But he is for the bill, yet he has claimed the time that is due those who are against the measure.

I am afraid that our Parliamentarian is fast becoming just a little bit too much adversely partisan, when he rules that just because one is a member of the committee he is entitled to demand the second, and thereby get in control of all the time against a measure, when such member is for the bill, and is going to speak in favor of it, and just because he is a Republican. Had not our Parliamentarian so ruled, the Speaker would have recognized me.

Since I have been in this House it has always been the rule that a Member against the bill is entitled to demand a second, in preference to any other Member who favors the bill. Otherwise, in a limited debate under suspension, where there is only 20 minutes allowed against a bill, such 20 minutes would be controlled by a Member in favor of the bill, and the entire time for debate would be in the control of proponents of the measure, which would be manifestly unfair.

I sincerely hope that our Parliamentarian will eventually forget that he received his first appointment from Republicans, under whom he served so long, and that his present appointment is from Democrats, who expect from him a fair, square deal at all times. He has deprived me of my right to control the time against this measure. And he persisted in advising the Speaker that a member of a committee, even though favoring the bill, was entitled to demand the second, and thereby control all of the time against the bill.

Because, eventually, he will have to change that ruling, for it is erroneous, and not in accord with the rules, I am registering this vigorous protest in the RECORD. The Parliamentarian will not deny that his ruling was erroneous.

Mr. Speaker, coming from a great committee, this is a most ridiculous proposition. This proposal will throw away $90,000. This is an undetermined claim. Suppose it were a judgment against Turkey, evidenced by her bonds due us. Suppose we had Turkey's bonds for $90,000? Would there be any assurance of getting money on it? Is Turkey any more stable than Great Britain? Is Turkey any more stable on a debt-paying proposition than France? Is Turkey any more stable on paying its bills than Italy, the great Mussolini government? They together owe us $10,000,000,000, and we have their bonds, and they will not pay one red penny.

Why, I have in my hand a statement here from the Treasury Department of the United States showing that today France owes this Government an honest debt, a debt of honor, of $3,803,650,000, and not a cent will France pay us. I have a statement here that Great Britain today owes this Government a debt of honor of $4,360,000,000, and not a dollar will she pay us. I have a statement here that Italy—the Mussolini government—owes this Government of the United States today a debt of honor of $2,004,900,000, and they will not pay us a single dollar.

This $90,000 would be wasted; you would not get a dollar back. It is taking good money of the people, who are already overburdened with taxation, and putting it down a rat hole. It is like pouring water in a prairie-dog hole. I am not going to do it. You can go home if you want to and tell your constituents, "Yes; with all that these big foreign governments already owe us and will not pay, we spent $90,000 of your money hoping to get a little money out of poor little Turkey." You will not get back even a soiled and broken tail feather out of Turkey. [Laughter.]

This is nothing in the world but a junket for certain officials of the State Department, and a junket to Turkey on the people's money. I have been here 17 years, and during that time I have been checking up on the various junkets the State Department has been taking every year on the money of the people. I am not going to vote for it.

Now, I am a good friend of Secretary Cordell Hull. I think as much of him as anybody does. I am a good friend of Wilbur Carr as well as of the chairman of this great committee, but Wilbur Carr has taken more junkets to foreign countries on just such measures as this than any other man in the United States. Wilbur Carr has been to Europe as many times, almost, as I have been to the White House, and I go to the White House about once each Congress.

You can vote $90,000 for this junket if you want to, but I am not going to do it. You can explain to your people when you go back home. I am not going to have to explain it to mine; I am going to tell them that I tried to stop it.

Mr. BLANTON's time having expired, Mr. BAKEWELL yielded him 5 minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. Remember, they are good, valid, subsisting debts that Great Britain, France, and Italy owe us to the tune of about $10,000,000,000. We have their solemn bonds drawn legally, with the amount agreed upon and already determined. They have agreed to pay us about $10,000,000,000. We already have their bonds for about $10,000,000,000. Yet today we cannot get a dollar from Great Britain, France, or Italy.

Now, you cannot get away from the facts of this case. This is not a case where Turkey has agreed to pay us $5,000,000 and we are to spend $90,000 in going over there to try to collect it. That would be foolish, for if Turkey had already agreed to pay us $5,000,000, I would not consider her promise to pay of any greater value than the promise to pay of Great Britain, France, and Italy.

Great Britain owes us, and has agreed to pay us, $4,360,000,000, and we have her bonds for that amount, and she will not pay. France owes us, and has agreed to pay us, $3,803,650,000, and we have her bonds for that amount, and she will not pay. Italy owes us, and has agreed to pay us, $2,004,900,000, and we have her bonds for that amount, and Italy will not pay. We are not spending $90,000 going to England, France, and Italy asking them to pay us $10,000,000,000 they owe and have agreed to pay, because we know we would waste the $90,000. But this is a proposal to spend $90,000 in going to Turkey, just to ask Turkey to agree to pay $5,000,000, and if she should so agree, there would be nothing accomplished, for we would get no money.

You will pass this bill, but next January I am going to show you where the money went, and who spent it, and show you that you did not collect one dollar by wasting this $90,000.

Look at what the other countries owe us, and we have their bonds. Here is Austria, $23,752,000; Belgium, $400,000,000; Estonia, $10,000,000; Finland, $8,000,000, and she is paying her debts, but owes $8,000,000 yet; Greece, $31,000,000; Hungary, $1,900,000; Latvia, $6,000,000; Lithuania, $6,000,000; Poland, $206,000,000; Rumania, $63,000,000; Serbs and Croats, $61,000,000. Only Finland is paying us. They are all debts evidenced by bonds and we cannot collect the money, and here you are talking about spending $90,000 of the people's tax money to go over there to try to get Turkey to agree that they owe you something. I am getting tired of seeing the money wasted.

Mr. TABER. Is Turkey on that list?

Mr. BLANTON. They expect to get some turkey, but they will not even get any sauce. They may get some sass.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I take it from what the gentleman is saying that he is in favor of paying his just obligations.

Mr. BLANTON. I am. Certainly, I pay my own obligations. And I expect these foreign nations to pay theirs.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Then why not pay these commissioners who have done the work?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, they have not done the work. They have done nothing. If they had been the right sort of commissioners, they would have something to show for it, and they have not anything to show for it. There is not a man here who has a higher regard or a deeper affection than I have for my colleague from Tennessee, our great Chairman of this Foreign Affairs Committee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS]. I have a deep affection for him, and I will go along with him on any kind of proper matter, but I want to say this, that if he does not watch this committee of his, and if he does not get them to quit voting out everything the State Department asks for, he will get his committee into such disrepute that we will be afraid to allow them anything.

Take that tin-can resolution that was reported out by the Rules Committee the other day——

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. That did not come out of my committee.

Mr. BLANTON. It is nevertheless another one that will waste money. You better watch it. We have to stop these bills, this junketing at public expense. I now yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to state that Mr. Carr, of the State Department, the Assistant Secretary of State, had been on "junkets" more times than he had been to the White House.

Mr. BLANTON. My last check-up showed that to be about correct, for I think that he has been on trips to foreign countries about that many times.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do not know how many times the gentleman has been to the White House, but I am very sure that the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Carr, has been abroad only once when all his expenses were paid by the Government.

I learned from the Department of State Mr. Carr has never gone abroad on any kind of junket. In his service of nearly 42 years there have been but three occasions when any of his expenses in traveling abroad have been reimbursed by the Government:

First. In September 1916 Mr. Carr was sent abroad by the Secretary of State for certain confidential work and was absent for approximately 2 months. The Government reimbursed all of his expenses for travel and subsistence.

Second. In 1931 Mr. Carr happened to be in Europe on a holiday at his own expense, when that holiday was interrupted by a telegraphic order from the Secretary of State to hold immigration conferences at London, Stuttgart, and Warsaw for the purpose of putting into effect administrative measures designed to curb immigration. The Government reimbursed his transportation and subsistence expenses while he was engaged on those conferences from the time he left Paris until he returned to take the steamer home. His ocean transportation and other expenses on that trip were paid from his own pocket.

Third. In 1932 he was sent by the Secretary of State to Paris to perform certain duties there, and was reimbursed by the Government for his ocean transportation and subsistence while actually engaged in Paris on official work for which he was sent over.

Mr. BLANTON. How many times has he been abroad in the last 20 years?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. But he has paid his own expenses.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the lady know how many times he has been abroad in the last 20 years?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do not.

Mr. BLANTON. I do know that he has been many times. I sat across the table from him in the committee room.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman call this a "junket"?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Mr. Carr may not call this a "junket", but they spend the money, and they have expenses paid.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. If a gentleman pays his own expenses, he is not on a so-called "junket."

Mr. BLANTON. Has the lady ever sat across the table from Carr in hearings?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I have.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentlewoman questioned him about these junkets?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. On what committee?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. On the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but I am on a committee that appropriates the money out of the Treasury, where we are concerned about how it is spent and where it is spent and by whom it is spent and why.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the ranking member of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. TABER] to the fact that the Senate did ratify this treaty in 1933.

Mr. TABER. I see something here about a commercial treaty. We have had a great many commissions—I would say 50 or 60—that we have appropriated a lot of money for, and I am wondering if any of those commissions ever resulted in the collection of any claim.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes, I can say to the gentleman; and I will put in the RECORD the amount that has been collected. A very large sum has been collected as a result of this work.

Mr. TABER. I know we have had a commission with reference to Mexico, but as I remember, except about a million dollars, they have never done a thing.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; they have. The United States and Mexico in 1933 referred to arbitration claims of Mexican nationals against the United States and of American nationals against Mexico. The arbitration has not been concluded, but to date the awards total $39,000 to Mexican nationals, and to American nationals $2,599,166.10.

A great many claims have been collected amounting to a great many thousand dollars, in fact, millions of dollars. In this case you are at most spending only $90,000, and you will get that back, and, I think, in view of the amount of money received in claims presented against other governments, at least $5,000,000.

This bill is an authorization for an appropriation. Before a penny is expended the Appropriations Committee must report out a bill appropriating money—the $90,000. Suggested in this bill is really only a loan for the purpose of presenting these claims, because the amount expended by the Government will be taken from the amount paid to the claimants. So that, as a matter of fact, it will cost the Government nothing. The claimants will pay for the presentation of their own claims in the end. Two thousand five hundred claims have been presented against the Turkish Government. Over 225 citizens of my own State of Massachusetts have claims against Turkey. The time for the Turkish Government to present any claims against us has expired.

I want to bring out the fact again that other countries in presenting claims against us have not secured any money to speak of; in fact, practically nothing, and we have secured a great deal of money.

Following are the figures which I mentioned previously:

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY

The Tripartite Claims Commission, established pursuant to the agreement of November 26, 1924, between the United States and Austria and Hungary, to adjudicate claims of American nationals against those countries for losses sustained during the World War, completed its work in 1929. The awards against Austria, including interest, were $370,052.14, and those against Hungary, $172,619.70.

CHINA

The Commission established by agreement between the United States and China to pass upon claims of American nationals against China arising out of the Nanking disturbances in 1927 concluded its work on March 13, 1929. There was awarded in favor of American nationals $887,177.58 Chinese currency and $54,550.52 in United States currency.

CUBA

The Governments of the United States and Cuba agreed to arbitrate the claim of Charles J. Harrah against Cuba for illegal destruction of private property by Cuban authorities. The arbitrators awarded $350,000 to the American claimant.

The United States and Cuba also agreed to arbitrate the claim of Capt. Walter Fletcher Smith on account of expropriation of property belonging to him. The arbitrator awarded Smith the sum of $190,000.

GERMANY

The United States and Germany established a Mixed Claims Commission to adjudicate the claims of American citizens against Germany arising out of the World War. Although its labors have not yet terminated, as of June 15, 1933, the Commission had handed down 6,823 awards in favor of American citizens, or a total amount of $265,939,068.37. The Government is being reimbursed for the cost of this arbitration by a percentage deduction from the awards.

GREAT BRITAIN

The United States and Great Britain referred to arbitration under The Hague Convention of 1907 certain claims of which 75 cases received final disposition. The United States received favorable awards in 66 cases and Great Britain in 9. The amounts involved ranged from a few hundred dollars to $5,000,000.

GUATEMALA

The United States and Guatemala referred to arbitration the claim of P. W. Shufeldt against Guatemala for alleged illegal cancelation of a concession. The claimant was awarded $225,468.38.

MEXICO

The United States and Mexico, in 1933, referred to arbitration claims of Mexican nationals against the United States and of American nationals against Mexico. The arbitration has not been concluded, but to date the awards to Mexican nationals total $39,000 and to American nationals $2,599,166.10.

PANAMA

The United States and Panama referred to arbitration the claims of 78 American citizens resulting from riots in Panama in 1912. The arbitrator rendered awards in the sum of $12,350.

The two Governments also referred to arbitration the claims of nationals of either country against the other. The Commission awarded $3,150 in favor of Panama, and $114,396.25 in favor of the United States. The United States Government was reimbursed for the entire cost of the arbitration by percentage deduction from the awards.

SWEDEN

The United States and Sweden submitted to arbitration a claim of Sweden against the United States for detention of Swedish ships during the World War. The arbitrator dismissed the claims, which involved an amount of $3,012,173.28. It seems to me in these days of tremendous expenditures of money with no return to the Federal Government, this is an extremely wise measure. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the lady yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose Turkey would admit that there was $5,000,000 due and agree to pay it, would we ever get a dollar of it?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; I am sure we would.

Mr. BLANTON. Is Turkey better than Great Britain and France and Italy, who, together, justly owe us, and have agreed to pay us, an aggregate of about $10,000,000,000, and we cannot get one dollar now?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The United States has had better luck in collecting from the smaller countries than from the larger ones—witness complete payment of debts by Finland. But because some countries do not pay their debts to us, is there any reason why we should not try to collect from other countries? It is the only way to help our citizens.

The SPEAKER. The time of the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] has expired.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas is very much excited over the fact that European governments have not paid their war debts. This bill has nothing whatever to do with war debts. It has to do with claims of citizens and organizations of America against the Turkish Government for damages incurred during the war. Similar claims have been brought against other governments. The gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the committee, read you the amounts of the claims that had been awarded against other governments, and, with the exception of two countries, those claims have been paid. We have no right to assume that the Government of Turkey will be false to its legitimate obligations. In any case, we ought not to be false to our obligations, and we have signed this treaty which calls for this meeting which is now being held. It is necessary, for us at least, to play an honorable role, and to meet in accordance with the terms of that treaty and see that those terms are fulfilled. It seems hardly necessary to answer the gentleman from Texas. Everything to him looks like a junket. I suppose that when he sat across the table from Mr. Carr he was himself on one of those so-called "junkets." If you read the statement of the Secretary of State, you will find that he is employing, as far as possible, members of his own organization, those who are already in the pay of the Government, so as to reduce to a minimum this cost.

It has been shown in the case of all the other countries, where similar situations have developed, that the claims have been paid, and that the Government has been reimbursed for the amount it had advanced. This will not cost the Government a penny, and may bring to our citizens many millions of dollars. I, for my part, propose to assume that Turkey is honest until she has been proven otherwise.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman claimed the time against the bill, and now he is speaking for it. I was not on that big a junket.

Mr. BAKEWELL. I was not asked whether I was for or against the bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Several citizens in Texas also have claims against Turkey, have they not?

Mr. BAKEWELL. They have.

Mr. BLANTON. But they have wiped them off. They knew they would never get anything out of it. And they do not want to have $90,000 more of their good money wasted and thrown away by this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BAKEWELL] has expired.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas and I are quite in accord as regards payments of the war debts which are owed to the United States Government by foreign countries. I want to call his attention and the attention of the House to the situation in which the House is going to find itself in regard to those debts. I wish that each Member of the House would look up the speech of the President which he made during his campaign in 1932 at Sioux City, Iowa. You will discover apparently what is happening to the foreign-debt situation. I was happy the other day to see such a positive message sent to the House in regard to the payment of foreign debts; but I call the attention of the House at this time to the fact that you have now passed tariff authority to the President, giving him authority to deal with and reduce tariffs with the same countries who owe us the war debts. He can now carry out the terms of his Sioux City, Iowa, speech. If he lives up to that speech made in Sioux City, you will find a trade being made of tariffs for war debts. In other words, the American people are going to pay for those war debts through loss of duties on foreign goods. The American workingman is going to pay through loss of wages and through settlement and adjustment deals made by the President under the powers granted by the present Congress. Tariffs will be lowered to those countries that owe us providing they agree to pay the war debts to us.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The act specifically provides that the war debts shall in no way enter into the question.

Mr. MCFADDEN. But the President will put it on what will be purported to be a broad economic basis. We cannot help but consider such a fact now that this authority has been given to the President in the tariff and money bills, and that it is further indicated by the President's messages to the House and his utterances during his campaign that he proposes to make a trade in tariffs to the countries that owe us, which in the last analysis will mean that foreign-made goods will be permitted to come in here at lowered tariff to compete with American-made goods, made by American labor, and American people will thus pay this war debt, just as the foreigners have intended that we should pay. It will be a shift of the burden from the foreigners to the back of the American taxpayer. So that is the predicament we are in. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and others who feel as he and I do in this respect should not have passed that law, but should have at all times insisted in a firm manner that the administration should live up to the rider on the moratorium bill, to wit, that there would be no further reduction or cancelation of the war debts.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] has expired.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I assure the House I shall not use all the time at my disposal. The gentleman from Texas says that he is on that committee which votes out or fails to vote out money; that is, the Committee on Appropriations. This bill merely makes an authorization. If we pass the bill, the matter of the appropriation will come before the Committee on Appropriations, the committee of which the gentleman from Texas is a member.

The gentleman from Texas commented on Mr. Carr. There was no evidence before the committee in reference to Mr. Carr. I want to say for Mr. Carr that I have never known him to take what the gentleman from Texas characterizes as a junket to any country, although Mr. Carr is in charge of the foreign agents. No one is more conscientious about his duties than this gentleman.

All I want to say to the Members is that in my opinion, if this authorization is given and the appropriation is made, it will not cost our Government one cent to undertake to collect the debts that Turkey owes to the citizens of this country. May I say further that this bill is recommended by Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State; and a request for its passage was made by the President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present, and I object to the vote on the ground that there is not a quorum present; and, pending the determination of that point, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold his point of no quorum?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE RIVERS OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Congress of the United States:

On February 2, 1934, by resolution, the Congress requested me to report on "a comprehensive plan for the improvement and development of the rivers of the United States, with a view of giving the Congress information for the guidance of legislation which will provide for the maximum amount of flood control, navigation, irrigation, and development of hydroelectric power."

Pursuant thereto I requested the Secretaries of the Departments of the Interior, War, Agriculture, and Labor to advise on the development of a water policy and on the choice of projects. I am sending herewith copies of their report, together with separate letters from the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Labor, and also:

(1) List of technical advisory committees of the President's committee.

(2) Review of reports of technical subcommittees on water flow.

(3) Review of report of technical subcommittees covering additions in the arid section, prepared by the Bureau of Reclamation.

(4) Seven reports of technical subcommittees covering various regions.

I ask that the Congress bear in mind certain obvious facts relating to these reports:

(1) That the time for the preparation of these reports was extremely limited.

(2) That the subject is one of enormous magnitude, covering the whole of the United States.

(3) That the resolution of the Congress, covering the subjects of flood control, navigation, irrigation, and development of hydroelectric power, automatically opened the door to all interrelated subjects which come under the general head of land and water use. This broader definition brings to our attention very clearly such kindred problems as soil erosion, stream pollution, fire prevention, reforestation, afforestation, marginal lands, stranded communities, distribution of industries, education, highway building, home building, and a dozen others.

(4) All of the reports were based primarily on information already at hand and further study is strongly recommended.

(5) For the purpose of making a preliminary test, I requested a wholly tentative trial selection of 10 specific projects. As I had expected, the report strongly doubts the advisability of recommending these projects, on the ground that any selection at this point must necessarily omit many meritorious projects which further analysis may show to be preferable.

(6) The reports of the technical subcommittees, covering various areas, are of definite value. But before any work is done, it is obvious that a competent coordinating body must go over all of these reports, as well as reports on other projects, and produce a comprehensive plan.

In view of the above, I, therefore, suggest that the Congress regard this message and the accompanying documents as merely a preliminary study and allow me, between now and the assembling of the next Congress, to complete these studies and to outline to the next Congress a comprehensive plan to be pursued over a long period of years. Further legislative action on this subject at this session of the Congress seems to me, therefore, unnecessary.

I expect before the final adjournment of this Congress to forward to it a broader outline of national policy in which the subject matter of this message will be presented in conjunction with two other subjects also relating to human welfare and security.

We should proceed toward a rounded policy of national scope.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 4, 1934.

During the reading of the President's message the following occurred:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want a long message read intervening. I insist on my point of no quorum. Let us get through with the bill under consideration. The reading of the message will take some time, and I insist on my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 268, nays 45, not voting 117, as follows:

PUERTO RICO'S CITIZENSHIP

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the citizenship bill and other bills introduced by me; and also to insert a memorial from the Legislature of Puerto Rico asking for statehood and a liberalization of our organic act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Delegate from Puerto Rico?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, the effect of this H.R. 5330 would be: (1) To enable persons born in Puerto Rico to acquire United States citizenship at birth, as all natives of New York, Illinois, Florida, and the other States, do; (2) to make this naturalization provision retroactive so as to cover all persons born in Puerto Rico after the change of sovereignty in the island—that is, since April 11, 1899—and who are permanently domiciled here, those temporarily residing abroad included; and (3) to give Puerto Rico women equality of rights of naturalization with—continental—American-born women. The bill also coincides with the policy of approximation to which the declaration of the last national Democratic platform with respect to Puerto Rico's statehood, clearly points.

First. It would establish the equivalent of the American constitutional rule regarding citizenship. All persons born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction hereof, are citizens of the United States.

Second. It would facilitate the proof of American citizenship when required. One born here after April 11, 1899, and domiciled here, would need to establish only the facts of his birth and domicile, without submitting any evidence as to the American nationality of his father.

Third. It would strengthen the Puerto Rican against any attempted discrimination with respect to status in the Federal laws and regulations, as in veterans' pension claims.

Fourth. It would point to a greater approximation of Puerto Rico to the mainland.

Puerto Rico stands literally at the crossroads of the world, at the entrance to the Caribbean region and on a direct line between east and west, north and south. San Juan, the capital and chief port, is but 1,000 miles away from the Panama Canal, 1,300 miles from New York or Philadelphia, less than 1,000 miles away from Habana, and under 4,000 miles away from the great European markets.

PUERTO RICO IS AN AMERICAN TERRITORY

In this connection I desire to quote from Hon. Harry W. Blair, the assistant to the United States Attorney General, the following memorandum:

I have had under consideration your request for recommendation on H.R. 7873 (73d Cong., 2d sess.) and reasons in support thereof, particularly concerning the request contained in the letter of SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico. I take it that the request of the Commissioner goes no further than to consider whether Puerto Rico is such a Territory as is intended to be governed by this act. I will, therefore, confine my consideration of the matter of that question.

It is to be first noted that the language of the act is broad, general, and comprehensive and without prohibitions or limitations as to any political subdivision of the United States. Section 1 reads:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Congress hereby declares that the cooperation of the Federal Government with the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia is necessary to prevent the premature closing of elementary and common schools. * * *"

Section 2 of the act uses the same term: "* * * as will enable the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, to maintain their regular school terms * * *"

The bill does not exclude any form of political government which might be said to be within the broad and general definition of "State or Territory." If, therefore, Puerto Rico may be said to be within the meaning of the term "Territories", the act applies to Puerto Rico. It is true that Puerto Rico is not a fully organized Territory such as Alaska and Hawaii and has not been incorporated into the Union as a Territory (Balzac v. People of Puerto Rico, 258 U.S. 298, 305). On the other hand, it has been held by the United States Supreme Court to be a completely organized Territory.

In a case in which there was involved the question of the right of the Governor of any organized Territory to issue requisitions for the return of fugitive criminals, the Supreme Court held (People of New York ex. rel. Kopel v. Bingham, Commissioner, 211 U.S. 468):

"Under section 17 of the act of April 12, 1900 (ch. 191, — Stat. 77, 81), the Governor of Puerto Rico has the same power that the Governor of any organized Territory has to issue requisitions for the return of fugitive criminals under section 2, article IV, Constitution of the United States, refers in terms only to the States, Congress, by the act of February 12, 1793 (ch. 7, 1 Stat. 302, now sec. 5278, Rev. Stat.), has provided for the demand and surrender of fugitive criminals by Governors of Territories as well as of States, and the power to do so is as complete with Territories as with States (Ex parte Regeel, 114 U.S. 642)."

Puerto Rico, although not a Territory incorporated into the United States, is a completely organized Territory.

SYLLABUS

In the opinion Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said, page 476:

"It may be justly asserted that Puerto Rico is a completely organized Territory, although not a Territory incorporated into the United States, and that there is no reason why Puerto Rico should not be held to be such a Territory as is comprised in section 5278."

Section 5278, Revised Statutes, referred to States in part:

"Whenever the executive authority of any State or Territory demands any person as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any State or Territory to which such person has fled, * * *."

We find therefore the general term "Territory" used in a statute similar to the one under consideration has been held to be a Territory within the meaning of the act.

Again in the case of Gromer v. Standard Dredging Co. (224 U.S. 362), the Supreme Court said with reference to Puerto Rico and the application of the Foraker Act of April 12, 1900 (p. 370):

"The purpose of the act is to give local self-government, conferring an autonomy similar to that of the States and Territories, reserving to the United States rights to the harbor areas and navigable waters for the purpose of exercising the usual national control and jurisdiction over commerce and navigation."

See also People of Puerto Rico v. Rosaly y Castillo (227 U.S. 270).

There must also be taken into consideration the organic act of Puerto Rico of April 12, 1900 (31 Stat. 77), known as "the Foraker Act", and the organic act of March 2, 1917 (39 Stat. 954), known as "the Jones Act", in which later act this provision appears:

"* * * the statutory laws of the United States not locally inapplicable, except as hereinbefore or hereinafter otherwise provided, shall have the same force and effect in Puerto Rico as in the United States, except the internal-revenue laws * * *."

There does not seem to be anything in the act under consideration locally inapplicable, and I see no reason why the act may not be as capable of operation in the territory of Pureto Rico as in State or Territory.

The same question, under a more doubtful status, was before Attorney General Mitchell with reference thereto, appearing in Thirty-sixth Opinions, 326. There the question was specifically as to whether the Agricultural Marketing Act which might not unreasonably be construed as limiting the operations of the act to continental United States. However, Attorney General Mitchell had under consideration the statute just referred to as to the applicability of the general laws of the United States where not locally inapplicable, and his opinion therefore appears as a precedent in the Attorney General's office that under similar expressions Puerto Rico is held to be included within the general term "Territory."

The specific question asked by the Commissioner is:

"The object of this letter is to ascertain whether under the term 'Territories' Puerto Rico is included and will benefit by this bill or any other bill where the word 'Territories' is used."

I, therefore, answer this question in the affirmative.

(Signed) HARRY W. BLAIR,
Assistant United States Attorney General.

The Legislature of Puerto Rico has approved a memorial that was addressed to Congress, which reads as follows:

Concurrent resolution to declare that the final status of Puerto Rico should be statehood and that the people of Puerto Rico dsire that Puerto Rico become a state, forming a part of, and associated with, the federation of the United States of America; to petition the Congress of the United States of America for legislation authorizing the people of Puerto Rico to adopt its own state constitution for its approval by the Congress of the United States of America, after it has been ratified by a plebiscite to which it shall be submitted; to demand from the Congress of the United States of America an immediate liberalizing reform, of a political and economic nature, of the autonomic regimen of government at present enjoyed by Puerto Rico, through amendments to the organic act in force, and for other purposes

PART I

Whereas for more than 35 years the people of Puerto Rico, in a state of deep preoccupation, have suffered the disappointments inherent in a regime under which it has been working among difficulties caused by differences in systems, laws, customs, and language, assimilating, however, with clear vision of the future, the fundamental ideals which serve as a basis for the institutions of our government;

Whereas during that interregnum in which the people of Puerto Rico have lived trusting in the justice of the people of the United States of America, the latter, believing the former capable of living a life of equality, dignity, and honor in their relations with each other, granted to the Puerto Ricans, through Congress, American citizenship with all the prerogatives inherent therein;

Whereas the consensus of opinion of the people of Puerto Rico shows that it is advisable to know what is to be the final status of Puerto Rico in its relations with the United States of America, with the understanding that the preservation of its characteristics and other traditions are not in conflict with the principles and ideals of the American Nation, and that the vernacular may subsist in conjunction with the use of the English language, all within the new structure of government within which the people of Puerto Rico will live in dignity in association with the people of the United States of America, under the same flag; and

Whereas the people of Puerto Rico have always aspired, and continue to aspire, to the fulfillment of the words which, in the lexicon of liberty of the United States of America, involved the consecration of the principle that "peoples have the right to determine their own destinies": Now therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of Puerto Rico:

SECTION 1. That the people of Puerto Rico desire that Puerto Rico become a state and be admitted to the Union under the same conditions as the States which integrate the same.

SEC. 2. To request from the Congress of the United States of America, as it is hereby requested, legislation authorizing the people of Puerto Rico to frame there own State constitution, in order to submit it for the approval of the Congress of the United States of America after it is ratified by the electoral body of Puerto Rico to which it shall be submitted through a plebiscite for such purpose, the result of which shall be certified by the executive secretary of Puerto Rico; and the Governor of Puerto Rico shall give notice thereof to the President of the United States for the proper purposes.

PART II

Whereas until the proceedings heretofore referred to in this resolution have been carried out, the people of Puerto Rico need urgently to improve the conditions of its internal life by protecting its agriculture and promoting the development of its industry, by reorganizing its government institutions, by regulating the application to Puerto Rico of certain acts of Congress, and by securing exemption from the effect of certain fiscal acts already enacted in the United States, by obtaining Federal aid in temporarily balancing its annual budgets without detriment to essential services, and by securing amendments to the organic act in force in order to attain said ends;

Whereas, with the enactment of measures of this kind, while the proceedings are being carried out and the obstacles in the way of enjoying the final status of statehood are being overcome, the people of Puerto Rico shall have full political and fiscal autonomy to solve its own problems and may temporarily enjoy its internal independence and its internal sovereignty: Now, therefore, be it

Further resolved by the Legislature of Puerto Rico:

SEC. 3. That the people of Puerto Rico demand an immediate liberalizing reform, of a political and economic nature, of the autonomic regimen of government which it now enjoys. petitioning the Congress of the United States of America, as it is hereby petitioned, to amend the organic act of Puerto Rico in force, in accord with the following:

1. Recognizing the right of the people of Puerto Rico to elect its own governor;

2. Granting powers to the Governor of Puerto Rico so that he may, with the advice and consent of the insular senate, appoint all the heads of department of the insular government of Puerto Rico;

3. Granting authority to the Legislature of Puerto Rico to fix the salaries of the heads of department, their powers and duties, and the number and titles thereof, without exceeding the number now existing;

4. Authorizing the Governor of Puerto Rico to fill the vacancies among senators and representatives without the need of holding partial elections, and on proposal of the directing body of the party to which the legislators whose post is vacant belonged;

5. Granting power to the Legislature of Puerto Rico to revoke the veto of the executive by the vote of two-thirds of the total number of members of each legislative house;

6. Providing that the jurisdiction of the United States District Court for Puerto Rico be limited to the same jurisdiction as that which belongs to courts of like nature in the States of the Union; and likewise providing that the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico or, by delegation, any of the associate justices, shall act as judge of said Federal court;

7. Stating that the decisions of the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico shall be reviewable only by the Supreme Court of the United States through the same procedure as that followed in regard to final judgments of the supreme courts of the States of the Union; adopting, moreover, the remedy of certiorari before said court in those cases in which there is a controversy in regard to the American Constitution or in regard to treaties or Federal laws;

8. Establishing that statutory acts hereafter enacted by the Congress of the United States shall govern in Puerto Rico when made expressly applicable to the island and adopted by the Legislature of Puerto Rico, except when they refer to the organization and operation of the Federal agencies, offices, and departments functioning in Puerto Rico;

9. The modification of all laws preventing competition in the transportation of freight and passengers between the United States and Puerto Rico in order to obtain a low-priced and adequate transportation service, and chiefly to avoid the rise in price of merchandise due to high freight rates.

10. That the Congress of the United States, as a rehabilitation measure, authorize Puerto Rico to establish fiscal tariffs, the object of which shall be:

(1) To provide revenues to meet the expenses of the current budget;

(2) To protect all the products of our agriculture and industry;

(3) To declare free from import duties all such articles of prime necessity for our people as are not produced in Puerto Rico.

And likewise to authorize the Legislature of Puerto Rico to exempt from customs duties, and to levy taxes on, construction materials and raw materials necessary for the promotion of the industrialization of the island; and likewise to prohibit the importation of all articles injurious to health due to the loss of their food value in the course of their preparation or otherwise.

SEC. 4. To request the Congress of the United States of America, as it is hereby requested, to enact legislation for the consolidation of the public debt of Puerto Rico as far as it may be possible, to make extensive to Puerto Rico the Federal Reserve Act and any other measures enacted for the benefit of national banking, for the benefit of banking in Puerto Rico; likewise making extensive to Puerto Rico all the Federal acts already enacted, or to be hereafter enacted, for the protection and promotion of the agriculture, industry, and commerce of Puerto Rico.

SEC. 5. To request the Congress of the United States of America, as it is hereby requested, to authorize the Legislature of Puerto Rico to adopt legislation tending to solve the problem of absenteeism, and, as a consequence thereof, the concentration of property of nonresidents.

SEC. 6. To request the Congress of the United States of America, as it is hereby requested, for the purpose of improving the health of the people of the island, a work already begun with the amounts appropriated and which are being distributed by the Federal Relief Administration, to appropriate in its annual budgets, as it is accustomed to do as aid to the Federal States, such sum as it may deem fair in order to drain the miasmal mangrove swamps and to combat tuberculosis and uncinariasis in Puerto Rico.

MIGUEL A. GARCIA MÉNDEZ,
Speaker, House of Representatives of Puerto Rico.
RAFAEL MARTÍNEZ NADAL,
President of the Senate of Puerto Rico.

The undersigned secretaries of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of Puerto Rico do hereby certify that the preceding resolution was duly adopted this 15th day of April 1934.

ANTONIO ARROYO,
Secretary, House of Representatives of Puerto Rico.

A CENTURY OF PROGRESS

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a brief oration delivered by the young high-school student who won the oratorical high-school championship.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it is with real pleasure that I take advantage of the unanimous consent of the House to print in the RECORD the following oration on A Century of Progress.

It was written by Harvey Schauffler, one of my young constituents and a student in the Glassport (Pa.) High School. Through the merit of his composition and the appeal of his delivery, this young American won the national original oration championship at Topeka, Kans., in competition with high-school students from all the States.

It was my privilege to hear it delivered in the home school before neighbors and friends. I was impressed with the orator's ability and with the evidences of the efficient training given by the faculty of his high school. I was especially impressed with the eloquent and timely message of the oration itself. America might well resolve to answer the challenge of Harvey Schauffler, an inspiring young product of our public-school system. The oration is as follows:

A few months ago on the shores of Lake Michigan there was epitomized, in an unusual panorama A Century of Progress, the world's fair, in essence a fragment of a possible scientific utopia—a utopia emphasizing not only the past, but like an enclave of one kind of civilization hemmed in by another almost totally different. It selected not what is actually representative of the life of man on earth today; it is what, by the grace of science, is going to be representative 20, 50, a hundred years from now. Lights twinkling, odd shapes, and showy colors blossoming along the Lake front—outward signs of Chicago's world fair. The Century of Progress represented a hundred years of development in medicine, chemistry, geology, physics, astronomy, industry, and art. Chicago spent millions of dollars to perfect a replica of tangible scientific progress. In medicine it pictured the slovenly, dangerous cures advocated by alchemists of an older age and brought the advancement up to today's supermicroscopes, isolations, inoculations, and immunities. Chicago depicted "travel and transport", an advance from the Conestoga wagon, a mere horse and cart, to the modern stream-line Century Limited; a century of progress in homes, producing a standard of living highly inflated as compared with ancient and temporary abodes. It showed the world sights never seen. It was a scene of life and virility with its constant striving for comfort, convenience, and happiness—a vivid and dynamic visualization of man's endeavor, a drama depicting the power of the human mind to conquer nature's mighty powers and to harness them for the benefit of mankind. Just as Chicago took root and grew to imposing size and beauty, so, too, those massive structures typified the very essence of the purpose of A Century of Progress. Here were shown the contribution of other civilizations, dwellings, and communities of foreign peoples and of aborigines, temples of the Orient, modern housing exhibitions, amusement places of thrills, pastimes, the "talkies", racing, the drama—all in A Century of Progress. Yet, in our minds, it is a century that has looked from the future toward the present, from the present back to the past.

On that lake shore stood the portrayal of man's marvelous contributions to enlightenment, welfare, and happiness. Hundreds of thousands of people thronged the grounds daily, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars, admiring these achievements of men. Indeed, they had every right, every reason, every privilege, to stand open-mouthed and awe-struck in amazement at the achievements of their fellow men. Here, indeed, was A Century of Progress. Yet, lurking in the background, hung that hideous monstrosity, that parasite of civilization—organized crime. It too had a century of progress. Science had portrayed noble achievement; yet the scourge of criminal progress still existed.

It is said that Cato the Elder was so convinced that the safety of Rome demanded the destruction of Carthage that for years he never rose in the Senate to speak on any subject that he did not begin by saying, "Carthage must be destroyed." Today another Carthage threatens the safety of a modern Rome, for we, like Cato the Elder must demand the destruction of crime. The past hundred years have been filled with progress and crowded with problems of tremendous variety and complexity; the World War, the inflation and deflation of business, our emergence as a creditor nation, the spectacular increase in efficiency, the onset of business distress, birth control, prohibition, race riots, immigration, woman suffrage, the League of Nations; yet the greatest progress has been made in crime. For years we have been accustomed to speak of the crime wave. Today, however, the crime wave is a permanent elevation. We are used to opening the daily papers and reading of bandits, who, in the heart of the city or at any other place they see fit, in broad daylight, hold up persons who have in their possession money or valuables, in some cases not even taking the trouble to disguise themselves, committing assault, injuring or killing the victims. Then we read that the trail is lost. Police forces have been increased 100 percent; yet murders have been increased 350 percent. The annual crime bill, through expenditures for the prevention and punishment of crime, the maintenance of jails and penal institutions, and the loss of property by fraud, or destruction by arson, amounts to the staggering total of $13,000,000,000. This stupendous sum is more than three times the annual cost of maintaining the Federal Government and is increasing every year.

America's largest industry today, in these times of industrial depression, is the gangsterized industry of racketeering, which organized on a Nation-wide scale, under the leadership of the country's most notorious criminals, corrupt politicians, and unscrupulous lawyers, is costing the American people $18,000,000,000 a year, seven and a half times the amount spent annually by the Federal Government and the 48 States of the Nation on public schools—and the amount is increasing every year. Today 120,000 crimson-handed assassins are roaming at large in this country, the number getting larger each year. Only progress means protection; yet today 400,000 citizens make their living through crime, constituting a scarlet army three times the size of the regular protective Army of the United States. Experts say that before his sojourn in the Federal Penitentiary at Atlanta, Al Capone's annual income was $100,000,000. Yet it is a well-known fact that honest and fearless law enforcement is often handicapped in the prosecution of gangsters, racketeers, and other criminals, because their victims are so terrorized that they will not testify against them in court.

Yes; while you stood in Chicago admiring A Century of Progress you stood in the very mecca of crime—the gangster's playground.

And still the American people are indifferent. Becoming bolder and more brazen, the gangsters, the hoodlums, the crooks, the racketeers, the white slavers, the kidnapers, the spawn of the gutter, the jails and the brothels, are throwing the dirty rag of defiance into the faces of the American people, of whom you are one; and, inconceivable as it may seem, the great body of the American people, of whom you are one, who, if they so wished, could end this frightful, disgraceful situation, are entirely indifferent about the matter.

The Nation's crime bill has been raised to $16,000,000,000. All over the Nation prisons are crowded. The violent death rate has doubled since 1900, and 12,000 people are murdered every year—a relic of barbarism that defies civilized countries. The American homicide record is a shameful disgrace for a country which affects the claim that it is a leader among enlightened people. We profess a century of progress in a nation having an evidence of lawlessness which has no counterpart in any other country in the world. President Roosevelt has said, "There is no justification for crime, when we, as a sovereign power, are charged with the responsibility of protecting the dependent against the whims of the lawless."

Now we stand on the threshold of a new era. Above us tower the mighty symbols of human progress and betterment. Yet, striding insolently ahead of us, moves the malevolent figure of evil and corruption. The challenge is not strange to us; it confronts us in our conversation, our thinking, our acts, and our daily living—one that we, as the American people, have ignored.

When we are as constant and faithful to our political rights as the slums and brothels, when the educated, industrious, and thrifty citizen is as zealous and prompt in political activity as crime is venal and sucking, then we will have a century of progress in dissociation of crime.

It is not to the scientists, mathematicians, and engineers to whom you and I must turn for our century of progress in the disruption of crime. It is to the workshop and office, to our churches and schools, to the God-given intelligence of every man and woman that assures the divine truth that right makes might that we must look to destroy this parasite of civilization. It is you and I who must rise in a new armor of militant leadership to build the truest century of progress—an era of morality. And it is only when you and I can bend the same efforts that made a century of progress in science, to the destruction of crime, that we shall realize the true significance of a higher century of progress.

RECESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, under the rules it is in order today to call up bills under suspension of the rules and to call the Consent Calendar. We have been here since 11 o'clock. The entire day has been taken up in suspensions. There are quite a number of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. A number of Members have come to me and said they were very anxious to have those bills called. Perhaps this will be the last time the Consent Calendar can be called during this session. I think it is only fair that this legislative day shall go over until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, under the rule adopted last week my motion is highly privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin cannot be recognized.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the majority leader if it would not be just as well if we met at 12 o'clock tomorrow?

Mr. BYRNS. Having asked that we meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow, should I now change it I would be confronted with objection on the minority side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that it does not take a quorum to recess; it takes only a majority of those present.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled.

Two hundred and twenty-one Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting draft of a proposed provision pertaining to the appropriations "Contingent expenses, public money", Treasury Department, for the fiscal years 1933 and 1934, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE (S.DOC. NO. 189)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Department of Commerce, fiscal year 1935, amounting to $102,430, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

JUDGMENTS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chief Clerk of the Court of Claims, informing the Senate that in the following cases referred to the court on March 3, 1923, by resolution of the Senate, under the act of March 3, 1911 (known as the Judicial Code), the court filed orders entering judgments in the amounts and dates set forth: Congressional, 17341, Rose City Cotton Oil Mill, May 7, 1934, judgment for $14,413.23; Congressional, 17505, Southwestern Cotton Oil Co., May 7, 1934, judgment for $1,570.98; and Congressional, 17560, Dallas Oil & Refining Co., May 7, 1934, judgment for $6,194.64, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Immigration Restriction League, Inc., of New York City, N.Y., protesting against the enactment of legislation loosening immigration restrictions, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the State Planning Board of Montana, favoring the prompt completion of the Poplar River irrigation project on the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Roosevelt County, Mont., which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Annapolis, Md., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 2800) to prevent the manufacture, shipment, and sale of adulterated or misbranded food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics, and to regulate traffic therein; to prevent the false advertisement of food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics; and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS—PETITIONS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I send to the desk petitions from several hundred citizens of Finney and Ford Counties, in southwestern Kansas, praying for early passage of Federal old-age-pension legislation. While I have the floor, Mr. President, I want again to direct the attention of the Senate to the necessity, as I see it, of early action along this line. I have introduced a bill on the subject, but, unfortunately, in the press of emergency legislation this session have not been able to get action upon it. However, if the bill is not successful at this session, I expect to press for action on this legislation at the next session of Congress, and hope that some helpful legislation will result.

If we, in this machine age, are going to continue to displace men with machines it is going to mean that an increasingly large percentage of our population over 45 years of age will be burdens upon the community. Our past experience with county poor farms and similar institutions is far from satisfactory. Institutional life for such a large part of the population as will be there in another generation at the rate we are going will in the end break down our civilization. Statistics indicate that from the viewpoint of governmental economy alone it is cheaper in dollars and cents to allow pensions to individuals than to keep them in institutions. A small gross-income tax on all able-bodied citizens between 21 and 45 years of age would, in my judgment, take care of an adequate pension system. I send the petitions to the desk for reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will be re-received and lie on the table.

THE MOTION-PICTURE CODE

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a letter received from Mr. Fred J. Herrington, of Pittsburgh, secretary of Motion Picture Theater Owners of Western Pennsylvania, Inc. It deals briefly with what Mr. Herrington terms conflicting statements with respect to the operation of the motion-picture code, and urges a neutral investigation of that industry.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOTION PICTURE THEATRE OWNERS OF
WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA, INC.,
Pittsburgh, Pa., June 2, 1934.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DAVIS: The confusion created by the conflicting statements of General Johnson and his subordinates for the N.R.A. and of Clarence Darrow for the National Recovery Review Board, with reference to the motion-picture code, makes it imperative for a neutral investigation of all the facts.

Mr. Darrow has charged that the N.R.A. motion-picture code is an oppressive instrument which tends to the complete monopolization of the industry by the "big eight" and is designed to crush small business. On the other hand, Solomon Rosenblatt, division administrator of the N.R.A., replies with vituperative invective, attacking those who testified before the Darrow Board, and points with pride to the many hours of work that he put in during the negotiations leading to the imposed code on the motion-picture industry. This is the first instance in the writer's varied experience when the amount of time put in was advanced as a deciding factor in favor of the resulting document.

The independent theater owners who are members of this association urgently request that you actively support the move for an investigation by the Senate of the United States into all phases of the motion-picture industry. This investigation should thoroughly cover the personalities and incidents leading to the promulgation of the motion-picture code by the N.R.A., and also the activities of the Darrow Board. With the Senate taking a hand in this matter, the facts surrounding the highly controversial issue of the motion-picture code will be settled once and for all. And, in our judgment, it will inevitably lead to proper legislation designed for the ultimate good of the American people.

We should like very much to hear from you, and we stand ready to furnish you with such additional facts as you may require in this matter.

Respectfully yours,

MOTION PICTURE THEATRE OWNERS OF
WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA, INC.,
FRED J. HERRINGTON, Secretary.

AMENDMENT OF FARM CREDIT ACT OF 1933

Mr. TYDINGS introduced a bill (S. 3740) to amend section 70 (a) of the Farm Credit Act of 1933, which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency; and, on motion of Mr. TYDINGS, the bill and accompanying memorandum were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill to amend section 70a of the Farm Credit Act of 1933

Be it enacted, etc., That effective 30 days after the enactment of this act, session 70a of the Farm Credit Act of 1933, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"(1) The board of directors of every Federal land bank, production credit association, and bank for cooperatives shall be selected as hereinafter specified and shall consist of seven members. Three of said directors shall be known as local directors, of whom one shall be chosen by and be representative of national farm loan associations and borrowers through agencies, one shall be chosen by and be representative of production credit associations, organized under the Farm Credit Act of 1933, and one shall be chosen by and be representative of borrowers from regional banks for cooperatives, organized under the Farm Credit Act of 1933. Four of the seven directors shall be known as Federal directors of the farm credit agencies and shall be appointed by the President by and with the consent of the Senate. All of said directors shall be residents of the district for which they are either elected or appointed.

"The local directors who have heretofore been elected and are now serving in the various Federal bank districts shall continue in office until the expiration of their present term. The successors of the present local directors shall be elected in the manner hereinafter prescribed in this act. The election of the successors to the present local directors shall be so arranged that the national farm loan associations and borrowers shall have one representative, the production credit association shall have one representative, and the regional bank for cooperatives shall have one representative. The term of office of each of the local directors shall be 3 years. The terms of office of the Federal directors first appointed shall be one for a term ending January 1, 1935, one for a term ending January 1, 1936, one for a term ending January 1, 1937, and one for a term ending January 1, 1938. Thereafter the terms of the successors to the first Federal directors appointed shall be 4 years. The Federal directors may be removed by the President at any time. The board of directors selected and appointed shall upon qualification take over the management and control of the farm credit agencies in the various land bank districts.

"(2) At least 2 months before an election of a local director the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration shall cause notice in writing to be sent to those entitled to nominate candidates for such local director. In the case of an election of a director to represent national farm loan associations and borrowers through agencies, such notice shall be sent to all national farm loan associations and borrowers through agencies in the district; in the case of an election to represent production credit associations, such notice shall be sent to all production credit associations in the district; and in the case of a director to represent borrowers from banks for cooperatives such notice shall be sent to all cooperatives which are borrowers at the time of sending notice. Within 10 days of receipt of such notice those entitled to nominate the director shall forward nominations of residents of the district to the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration. The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration shall, from such nominations, then prepare a list of candidates for such local director consisting of the 10 nominees receiving the highest number of votes.

"(3) At least 1 month before the election of a local director the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration shall mail to each person or organization entitled to elect the local director the list of the 10 candidates nominated in accordance with the provisions of the previous section of this act. In the case of an election of a director to represent national farm loan associations and borrowers through agencies, the directors of each farm loan association shall cast the vote of such association for one of the candidates on the list. In voting under this section each such association shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to the number of stockholders of such association and each borrower through agencies shall be entitled to cast 1 vote. In voting under this section each production credit association shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to the number of the class B stockholders of such association. In voting under this section each cooperative which is a holder of stock in a bank for cooperatives (except the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration) shall be entitled to cast 1 vote. The votes shall be forwarded to the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, and no vote shall be counted unless forwarded to him within 10 days after the list of candidates is received. In case of a tie the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration shall determine the choice. The nominations from which the list of candidates is prepared, and the votes of the respective voters, as counted, shall be tabulated and preserved, and shall be subject to examination by any candidate for at least 1 year after the results of the election is announced."

The memorandum above referred to is as follows:

MEMORANDUM REGARDING PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE FARM CREDIT ACT OF 1933

The proposed amendments to the Farm Credit Act of 1933 will give the President the right and power within 30 days after it is enacted to appoint, with the consent of the Senate, four Federal directors in each of the several land-bank districts in the United States. The President has the right to remove these Federal directors at any time.

The election of the three local directors is not changed. Those in office will continue there until their terms expire and then their successors will be elected, one to represent the farm loan associations, the second to represent the production credit associations, and the third to represent the regional bank for cooperatives.

One other change made is that the election of the local directors is placed under the control of the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration rather than under the Land Bank Commissioner. As I understand it, the Land Bank Commissioner has really been merged in the other credit organizations.

The enactment of this amendment in its present form will remedy a lot of the evils which now exist in the administration of the credit agencies and will place the control of the credit directly under the President. In view of the fact that the present Congress has enacted legislation that makes the United States responsible for both the interest and principal of the debts incurred by these various agencies, the head of the Government should have complete control over the appointment of a majority of the directors of these important governmental agencies.

REVISION OF AIR-MAIL LAWS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business, being House bill 9745, be laid before the Senate and then be temporarily laid aside, according to the unanimous-consent agreement of yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the unfinished business is laid aside temporarily, and the Chair lays before the Senate the conference report on the air mail bill, so called.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3170) to revise the air-mail laws.

Mr. AUSTIN obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator would like to have a quorum present.

Mr. AUSTIN. I prefer not to take the time to call for a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I had intended not to discuss the conference report on the bill providing for a revision of the air-mail laws; but after examining the report carefully and, I confess, after being excited somewhat by the activity of people who I thought represented public opinion fairly, I feel it my duty to say something about the conference report, in view of the special study I gave to and experience I had with the subject matter as a member of the Special Committee to Investigate Ocean-Mail and Air-Mail Contracts.

It has been pointed out to me several times that it was, perhaps, unfortunate that the membership of the conference committee had not included someone like the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], who advocated here in the Senate opposing views to the views expressed either in the House bill or the Senate, and who expressed those views by way of a substitute offered for the Senate bill. Of course, it is obvious that I would naturally oppose the adoption of the conference report, in view of the opinions which I have expressed in debate and in the amendments which I had a part in offering.

However, there are other reasons than those of adhering merely to a previous opinion that excite me to oppose the conference report. They are contained in the report itself, for, as I interpret it, the report does not represent entirely what was offered by the Senate or what was offered by the House. Of course, there is matter in the conference report which was offered either by the House or by the Senate, and was actually considered by those bodies as a legislative act, but, if I interpret the conference report correctly, there is new matter in it which never was contemplated by either House or Senate and which has never been considered or debated in the Senate.

Speaking generally of the conference report, I call attention to something which is obvious, and that is that the entire policy of the Federal Government toward air mail and aeronautics is reversed by this proposed legislation. As the matter stood when the cancelation of the air-mail contracts occurred, the policy of the Government was to encourage aeronautics, so as to specify the requirements of a contract for the carriage of the air mail that the carrier must equip his planes with safety devices for the benefit of passengers as well as of mail and express. Encouragement was afforded by means of a policy of subsidizing the service. The pending conference report proposes entirely to reverse that plan. If this report shall be adopted and the bill in this form shall become a law, there will be nothing in the measure that will be assured save securing the transportation of mail at the cheapest possible cost. The obvious economic effect of that upon aeronautics will be that the carrier will reduce his costs to a sum within the amount of his bid, if possible; that, indeed, he will go one step farther and reduce his costs to a point where he may earn some return by way of profit for the capital invested and for the service performed by executives and employees. On no other basis do we Americans conceive that we may have prosperity or that we may restore unemployment; and yet, if this report should become a law, it would discourage the incentive which has excited the highest endeavor in developing the great aeronautical industry in the United States.

Practically speaking and specifically, the difference in policy is vital in this way: If carried into effect, it will mean that the mail will be moved in planes having such equipment and value as may be expressed by, say, $15,000 or $20,000 for airplanes, whereas the effect of the other policy, up to the time of the cancelation of the air-mail contracts, was that the air mail was carried in planes which represented a cost of from $50,000 to $70,000 per airplane.

Of course that is only one incident or one piece of evidence tending to show what the effect of this reversal in public policy may be; but it seems to me that it is sufficient evidence, it is convincing evidence of the inadvisability of such a policy. This change is expressed in section 3 of the conference report under which these contracts are opened to bidding, and any other method of letting contracts is entirely excluded. Under the law as it now exists these contracts may be entered into by certificates by means of which the Government keeps control over the contractor and requires performance according to the specifications regarding safety and efficiency, to which I have referred. All that is to be done away with. The Postmaster General may not award an extension or a certificate under this proposed law when it goes into effect to a company which has demonstrated its ability and its superiority in the service of the public. Under the bill as it now stands that company will get the contract which shall submit the lowest bid for the service. This is very significant; it is a vital distinction; it is an entire change of the policy of the United States Government.

There is no expression in this conference report of the attitude of the Federal Government toward the national defense; there is not one word in the conference report that reflects any policy of the United States to encourage the development of aeronautics in the interest of public defense; and I submit that therein lies a grave defect in this report, for there probably is no single activity which is more vital or more effective in the national defense than that of aeronautics. If we are to keep pace with the other nations of the world, we must so arrange our policy in this country as to encourage the development of speed, efficiency, and safety in the flying of the air for the purpose of national defense.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] occasioned by illness, and the absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] occasioned by official business.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, continuing my observations on the conference report, in a word it will be observed that there is a vital change in the policy of the Government expressed by the conference report, and that is a complete departure from the policy of subsidizing a great public service such as this. I submit to the Senate the unwisdom of making such a vital change in our public policy before, and not after, the report of the commission which the bill professes to create for the purpose of ascertaining what should be the policy of the United States regarding this service.

Instead of leaving the status quo for the commission to study and to use the facts ascertained by its study in considering the problems relating to the subject, the proposed law completely wrecks all existing law under whose beneficent influence there has grown up the greatest Air Mail Service in the world. The wreckage is not temporary. The conference report is designed to make it permanently effective. Throughout the conference report there is written, in words so plain that one who runs may read, the consolidation and the destruction of the Service itself and of the great law under whose influence it was created. At the outset the first contract will run for 1 year, and under the terms of the conference report it may be continued indefinitely, showing that the purpose, although it is under the guise of a 1-year contract, is really to arrange that it may be continued for years and years.

In the meantime we must consider that there are 21 sections in the conference report, of which the first 19 require certain definite changes to be made in the Air Mail Service, to be made in the character of relationship between the contractor and the Government, all of which 19 provisions become effective before the proposed commission begins to operate and prepares and submits its report for the consideration of Congress.

The conference report makes it almost certain that any commission appointed under the provisions of the measure will be led away from the fine policies, crystallized in the remarkably short time of 4 years under the McNary-Watres Act, whose benefits we have been enjoying in this country, and leading to a system of competitive bidding in a case where competitive bidding is entirely inconsistent with the character of the institution.

As I have previously said, we might as well ask the New York Central Railroad to bid on a mail service over the Santa Fe as to call for competitive bids for the carriage of the mail, for the simple reason that an airway consists of a great plant on the ground. The ship flying in the air is only a part of it; and if we are to retain these great transcontinental services which were built up under the McNary-Watres Act we must be able to assure to the contractors and operators the benefit of that investment on the ground.

The conference report aims at cutting up those great services into little, short pieces. When I arrive at the part of the bill which accomplishes that purpose, I shall call particular attention to it. That is a reversion to the very conditions which brought about the enactment of the McNary-Watres Act 4 or 5 years ago.

It is possible that the commission to be created might reach the conclusion that at least some portions of the former and present air-transport systems are sound, and should be continued. The commission, to be really effective, should have a full opportunity of considering the present status before that status is completely changed; yet the provisions of the conference report, 19 of them, require change, fundamental change, representing the ideas of those who participated in framing the conference report. We well recognize some of these distinguished men as entirely set, almost a fixed idea possessing them, against subsidizing air mails, and I do not know but that they are opposed to subsidy in general anyway.

Speaking generally of the conference report again, it would subject this relatively small industry and business to the jurisdiction of five different departments of government—the Post Office Department, the Department of Commerce, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the National Labor Board, and the Comptroller General—and each one of these departments is given an amount of authority which would render it possible to bankrupt every one of the aviation organizations.

I call attention to the provision relating to rates in section 3 (a) of the report, in which it is provided that in no case shall the rate exceed 33⅓ cents per airplane mile for transporting a mail load not exceeding 300 pounds; and it continues:

> Payment for transportation shall be at the base rate fixed in the contract for the first 300 pounds of mail or fraction thereof plus 0.1 of such base rate for each additional 100 pounds.

I submit that that is most illogical and uneconomical, and ought not to be made the law. It is extremely arbitrary. For an increase of the load one-third, there is an increase of pay of 0.1.

I should like to know what business man could possibly enter upon a service like that unless he had in view the possibility of something in the future being done to change the conditions. How could a business man enter upon such a service as that at such a rate with any hope of living, with any hope of saving the investors in and the employees of the industry, when the more he does, the deeper he goes in the hole?

Now, let us take subparagraph (c) of section 3, which reads:

> If, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, the public interest requires it, he may grant an extension of any route, for a distance not in excess of 100 miles, and only one such extension shall be granted to any one person, and the rate of pay for such extension shall not be in excess of the contract rate on that route.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is an admission of one of the controverted issues before the Senate when we were considering the Senate bill. The issue was whether the McNary-Watres Act enabled the Postmaster General to make extensions; and those who espoused the Senate bill denied that it gave the power to make extensions unlimited in number and unlimited in mileage as they were made by Postmaster General Brown. Now they come before us and, having achieved their objective of the destruction of that law and of the institution, provide expressly for a limitation in mileage to 100 miles, and for a limitation in number to one extension. Of course, it is gratifying to us who held the view that the McNary-Watres Act specifically authorized the Postmaster General to establish air-mail routes by many extensions, and by extensions of more mileage, to find that the soundness of our view is thus admitted by the conference report.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. WHITE. I think what the Senator has said about extensions is completely justified. In the conference committee provision the conferees have recognized the soundness of the principle of extensions and then, as I said once before, they have run away from that principle, because they have provided that if there were a line running between A and B, we will say, an extension might be granted from A, and then that extension, having been granted, however much greater might be the justification for an extension at B, it could not be done under this provision as the conferees have framed it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I recognize that that is absolutely true, and I recognize also how unsound it is in principle, how utterly absurd it is; and the natural effect of it must be that the Postmaster General's hand is palsied in any effort to make a logical route, to make a through route, to make a route that is controlled and operated by one contractor. That is true because not only is he limited to one extension and that to 100 miles, but he is also limited by another provision in the conference report which permits a contractor to hold only three contracts at the outside, and which enables him to serve over only one primary route. I shall refer to these things a little later.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator whether the objections which the Senator is voicing go to jeopardies that were inherent in the original Senate bill entirely, or whether the conference report adds to the jeopardies?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the conference report increases the jeopardies in all directions—jeopardies with respect to responsibility, jeopardies with respect to efficiency, jeopardies with respect to speed of delivery of mail and of passengers, and finally an absolute limitation of the service that may be performed by the contractors.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In other words, if the bill as originally passed by the Senate was considered inimical to wise and appropriate air development, it is the Senator's view that the conference report multiplies that hazard and makes the contemplation even more unacceptable?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is the view which I hold. I desire now to call attention to one point in that respect. It is in clause (d) of section 3, reading:

> The Postmaster General may designate certain routes as primary and secondary routes and shall include at least four transcontinental routes and the eastern and western coastal routes among primary routes. The character of the designation of such routes shall be published in the advertisements for bids, which bids may be asked for in whole or in part of such routes.

This is an absolute reversal of the provision in the Senate bill.

I now call attention to the language of the Senate bill as it stood before the conference got hold of it:

> Provided further, That the Postmaster General may designate certain routes as primary and secondary routes and may include at least four transcontinental routes, extending to termini, as nearly as practicable, on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, as primary routes. All other routes shall be secondary routes.

The new matter brought in by the conference report changes the entire purport of that provision. The words "and the eastern and western coastal routes among primary routes", are added, the number is increased to six, and the operation is so changed that two of these routes may be allowed north and south, whereas the original bill designed only four primary routes, to run east and west.

The conference report excludes "from coast to coast" and opens up the authority of the Postmaster General so that he may specify any number of such routes, and he is not bound by the policy declared by the Congress in the original bill, which describes the termini. He may make the termini entirely different from those contemplated in the policy adopted by the Senate when it discussed the proposed legislation before it went to conference, and he may make every one of the routes in this country a primary route. The effect is to cut the country up into a string-bean plan, as we were before the McNary-Watres Act was enacted, an entirely illogical plan, based on many different contractors undertaking to do a transcontinental business, and connecting up with each other, with all the hazards, with all the delays, with all the natural results of having a transaction such as transportation from ocean to ocean handled by many instead of handled by one operator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is illustrating very forcefully his answer to my question, to demonstrate the change which has been made by the conferees in the Senate bill. May I ask whence the new idea in the conference report comes? Does it come from the House bill, or is it brandnew matter?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, nothing was presented by the Senate, nothing was presented by the House, that would permit any such power. It is matter which comes from the conference itself, and not from either House of Congress.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then would it be fair to say that we are not considering a conference report in the normally accepted use of that phrase, but that we are considering airmail legislation de novo in net effect?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, that is my interpretation of it. As I interpret the provision alone which I have read, it is of such character and scope and of such effect that it means legislating anew. This is a policy which neither House of Congress has ever debated or ever considered. It is here de novo. It may be said that the subject matter was, in a certain way, considered by the Senate, but the new material in the report changes the provision entirely.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then, Mr. President, why is it not subject to a point of order?

Mr. AUSTIN. I saw fit not to raise the point of order, because of the purpose I had of getting into the RECORD for future reference the views I held currently with the return of this conference report to the Senate, for I conceived that nothing we do today will bind the American people, and when they come to exercise their powers, which are supreme, we may want to have something to refer to by way of a record.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But it is the Senator's view that if a technical course were pursued, the report would be subject to a point of order?

Mr. AUSTIN. I believe that to be true.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator has referred to this particular section as containing matter that was in neither the House bill nor the Senate bill, and he is exactly right in that statement. I take it that one could go through the conference report and find a dozen instances where the conferees have inserted matter in the bill now before us which was never in contemplation either by the Senate or by the House, or was even referred to in either the House or Senate bill. They have written a piece of legislation, and it is brought here for consideration by the Senate practically de novo.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Maine has had wide legislative experience in both houses of Congress. May I ask him whether, in his judgment, the conference report would be subject to a point of order? I am asking, not for the purpose of making the point, but for the purpose of definitely personifying the conclusion.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator is more familiar with the rules of the Senate than I, because he has served here longer. What happened was that, after all following the enacting clause of the Senate bill was stricken out and the House amendment was inserted, I presume the conferees proceeded on the theory, in those circumstances, that the entire subject matter was open to them, and that they could therefore write new legislation.

I have been told that that question has not been definitely passed on by the Senate. I do not know what the ruling of the Presiding Officer here would be. There is no question at all, however, that the conferees have gone outside the language and the purpose and the spirit of both the House and the Senate bills in drafting the report which is now before us.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. It is my judgment that if the Senator from Maine believed that the conferees had gone outside of the Senate bill and the House amendment it would be his duty to raise a question of order. I deny that the conferees have done any such thing. If the statement is correct, and the conference report is subject to a point of order, we invite the point of order. There has been no departure from the purpose of the Senate bill and the House amendment; there has been no departure which justifies, in my judgment, the statement which has been made in response to the question of the Senator from Michigan. If that be the case, I suggest that the points of order be raised, rather than criticize the report on that ground, and not raise the points of order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I hope the point of order will not be raised while I am occupying the floor. I suppose it might be, but I hope no one will raise a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would hold that the Senator could not be interrupted for that purpose.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I am convinced that the conference report should be recommitted, because of the fact that the rule has been violated. I intend to raise the point myself at a later time, and attempt to argue it. I am convinced that in the conference report will be found matter not found in either the House amendment or the Senate bill, and if that be the case, of course it is subject to a point of order. What the Presiding Officer may do with it, or what the Senate may do with it, I do not know, but I am convinced that it is clearly outside the rule.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Because of the colloquy which has taken place, and especially the statement of the Senator from Maine——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I make the point of order that while the conversation going on may be interesting, we cannot hear it over here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The Senator from Ohio will speak so that the Senator from New York may hear him.

Mr. FESS. I invite the Senator to come over to this side of the Chamber.

Mr. COPELAND. Do I have to leave my place and go over to the Republican side?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not pass on that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. It would improve the situation if the Senator would do so.

In the colloquy to which we have just listened in regard to whether the conferees have gone beyond their authority or not, the Senator from Maine made the statement, in accordance with the fact, so far as I know, that this question has not been raised before in the Senate. But this is the statement in the report:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following—

There is the blanket authority—

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following.

Then, with that blanket statement, the conferees throw in everything, new and old, what has been considered and what has never been considered.

I think it is doubtful whether, under the rules of the Senate, the conferees can use that blanket authority and write anything they please into the proposed legislation. Everybody will admit that there are things in the conference report that were considered by neither the Senate nor the House, but whether they can be included through a blanket method of the kind employed ought to be settled by the Presiding Officer.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, one of the policies of our Government, through a long period of experience with transportation by rail, has been economy, and the method of securing economy has been by consolidation into great transcontinental routes, and such a policy has been upheld by the decision of the Supreme Court even so recently as in the Allegheny case.

The designation in this conference report of four transcontinental routes and the eastern and western coastal routes as primary routes is mandatory. It is to be noted that other routes may be so designated. That is, the Postmaster General has a permissive right to designate many other routes as primary. In view of the provisions in section 15 prohibiting any one contractor from operating more than one primary route, the result of the operation of the new law may be to bring about a series of later readjustments of companies, with all the attendant confusion, losses to stockholders, and lessening of economies in operation. The purpose obviously is to confine each operator's energies to one particular line. To this I object This is a complete reversal of the policy of the United States in the interest of its citizens both with respect to transportation by rail and by air.

I now call attention to subsection (e). I read:

(e) If on any route only one bid is received, or if the bids received appear to the Postmaster General to be excessive, he shall either reject them or submit the same to the Interstate Commerce Commission for its direction in the premises before awarding the contract.

What kind of legislation is that? What check is there imposed by Congress on the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to the bids? What guide is there to direct the Interstate Commerce Commission what to do with the bids? There is absolutely nothing of the kind. Carte blanche is given this Department, one of the five departments which will have jurisdiction over this small industry, to exercise powers which are unrestricted, ungoverned, unguided, and which we know may be exercised to the destruction of the aviation companies. I am considering the conference report with respect to its possibilities, for that is the only way to test legislation in the process of formulation. I object to the conference report because it includes such a provision as that to which I have just referred.

I now read the next subsection:

(f) The Postmaster General shall not award contracts for air-mail routes or extend such routes in excess of an aggregate of 29,000 miles, and shall not establish schedules for air-mail transportation on such routes and extensions in excess of an annual aggregate of 40,000,000 airplane-miles.

Why should Congress want to withdraw encouragement to that extent? Why should Congress have such a grudge against the people of the United States that it wants to restrict and limit the enjoyment by the people of this service? This provision is deadly. It contains not an element of progress. It represents retrogression. There is no chance of development beyond those limits. Not only that, it really runs short of the mileage which was being flown at the time of cancelation of the air-mail contracts.

I have here information furnished by Harllee Branch, Second Assistant Postmaster General, who is in charge of the Air Mail Service, and I call attention to what that Service was prior to the annulment of contracts. The total route mileage was 25,248 miles. The daily trip mileage was 111,381 miles. And the annual trip mileage was 40,653,907 miles.

In other words, this bill fixes an annual trip limit of less than that which was being flown at the time these contracts were canceled. Is that wise? Is that the policy of this Government? I submit that is a question which will be of great interest to the people, and there will be a response to it.

Moreover, it is entirely unnecessary to provide such a limitation. With the scheme as it is now set up to let these contracts to the lowest bidder, why put on such a limit? It is not in the interest of economy. The only interest there can be in such a scheme is to deprive the citizens of the service.

Now I read section (g):

(g) Authority is hereby conferred upon the Postmaster General to provide and pay for the carriage of mail by air in conformity with the terms of any contract let by him prior to the passage of this act, or which may be let pursuant to a call for competitive bids therefor issued prior to the passage of this act, and to extend any such contract for an additional period or periods not exceeding 9 months in the aggregate at a rate of compensation not exceeding that established by this act nor that provided for in the original contract: Provided, That no such contract may be so extended unless the contractor shall agree in writing to comply with all the provisions of this act during the extended period of the contract.

Here is the vindictive feature of that temporary contract carried into effect in the future in this surreptitious and covert manner. Reading this sentence one does not perceive that the real object and purpose of that particular section of the conference report are to fasten upon the contractors who performed this great service before February 19, 1934, a stigma, a disability, and completely to disqualify them all for a long enough time so that the destructive effect of that exercise of sheer force contrary to law may become permanent.

I ask, Do the citizens of the United States wish to tolerate legislation which encourages disregard of the law and encourages a tyrannical and impetuous exercise of power by the officers of government? I know they do not. That is what that provision of this conference report does, and it does it covertly, under an artfully drawn sentence which does not disclose its extent and scope, and would never be noticed unless someone called attention to the fact that the contracts let for temporary service were upon bids which contained a specification that disqualifies all those who formerly enjoyed the contracts and performed the service of the air mail.

I now skip over, because my time is passing, to section 6 (a):

SEC. 6. (a) The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed, after notice and hearing, to fix and determine by order, as soon as practicable and from time to time, the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for the transportation of air mail by airplane and the service connected therewith over each air-mail route, but not in excess of the rates provided for in this act, prescribing the method or methods by weight or space, or both, or otherwise, for ascertaining such rates of compensation, and to publish the same, which shall continue in force until changed by the said Commission after due notice and hearing.

That is a limitation to 40 cents. Forty cents is the maximum possibility of the rate which can be paid, and it is restricted. It hinders development. It has no regard for the peculiarities and the special difficulties and burdens of one section of the service over another. Nor does it have any regard for the type of the service or the amount of the investment in it.

To be sure, there is a provision later, namely, subsection (d), which applies to the consideration of this question certain provisions of the law governing railroads, but we submit that those provisions are complex, that they were designed to apply to such a different institution, so many thousands of miles of railway and so many cars, that they are too cumbersome to apply to a little institution with only 600 carriers: that is to say, 600 airplanes.

The peculiarity of the conference report on this particular topic is set forth in subsection (e) which reads as follows:

(e) In fixing and determining the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for air-mail transportation, the Commission shall give consideration to the amount of air mail so carried, the facilities supplied by the carrier, and its revenue and profits from all sources, and from a consideration of these and other material elements, shall fix and establish rates for each route which, in connection with the rates fixed by it for all other routes, shall be designed to keep the aggregate cost of the transportation of air mail on and after July 1, 1938, within the limits of the anticipated postal revenue therefrom.

What an illogical scheme that is. After 1938 the revenue which it is anticipated will be derived is to be the limit, and under the authority here proposed for fixing rates they shall be so apportioned that all the different contractors shall bear an equal share of the burden, regardless of the actual load carried. In other words, the provision makes the carrier who carries a heavy load do so at a less rate than the carrier receives who carries a light load because of this limitation in the aggregate. On the other hand, Mr. President, a rational basis, a rational provision to have been put into this proposed law, if we were going to use any such plan of fixing rates, would have been to apportion the income to the specific carrier according to the service he performed. But does this measure permit any such thing? Not at all. There is no discretion about it. The Commission is directed to fix the rates in such a manner that the income is divided among all the carriers regardless of the load they carry.

Section 7a provides for divorcing all companies which are engaged in transportation of mail from those engaged in the manufacture of planes and equipment Of course, there is a place where those who proposed and supported the Senate bill and we who opposed it and recommended a substitute for it will never agree.

On our part we recognize that the history of the industry shows that this combination vertically enabled the art to have a stimulating benefit, the indispensable and necessary benefit, of the capital and the special skill and service of the companies which flew the mail as well as of those companies which provided the inventor and the manufacturer. Together they furnished all the necessary actors in this wonderful work, the speeding up of the efficiency of the airships, and the manufacture of safety devices and other improvements. In our opinion, they should not be divorced.

However, Mr. President, the complaint we make this instant is that this bill, should it become a law, would effect the unscrambling of them all before ever the commission that is created by the bill may study that problem, submit its report to the Senate, and have that report considered by the Senate; in other words, we are enacting permanent legislation before we hear a report derived from any intelligent study of the subject. Instead of preserving the status quo we are consolidating the complete destruction of the status quo before we have the benefit of the report of this Commission; and to that we object. That is waste. I now call attention to subsection (d) of section 7, which reads as follows:

(d) No person shall be qualified to enter upon the performance of, or thereafter to hold an air-mail contract (1) if at or after the time specified for the commencement of mail transportation under such contract such person is (or, if a partnership, association, or corporation, has a member, officer, or director, or an employee—performing general managerial duties—that is, an individual who has theretofore entered into any unlawful combination to prevent the making of any bids for carrying the mails: Provided, That whenever required by the Postmaster General the bidder shall submit an affidavit executed by the bidder, or by such of its officers, directors, or general managerial employees as the Postmaster General may designate, sworn to before an officer authorized and empowered to administer oaths, stating in such affidavit that the affiant has not entered nor proposed to enter into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mails, nor made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person to bid or not to bid for any mail contract, or (2) if it pays any officer, director, or regular employee compensation in any form, whether as salary, bonus, commission, or otherwise, at a rate exceeding $17,500 per year for full time.

The conferees went clear out to the end of the branch there—

More vindictiveness; more saving of face; more effort to uphold the strong right arm that struck down the rights of citizens without trial, without hearing, without any lawful right to do so; writing it into the law; and Congress doing it with its eyes wide open. After full consideration of the whole matter now Congress is about to say that is all right; it is a proper thing for an official of the Government to exercise the power of his office, being a Cabinet minister, to destroy a whole class of contracts, condemn a whole school of citizens without trial, all done collectively without separate opportunity for consideration afforded; all smeared with the same tar brush, regardless of any considerations they severally might have to interpose either by way of complete defense or by way of palliation or anything of that kind. All of them are dubbed and characterized as frauds and crooks, and by legislation we now are about to say that is all right.

The first part of this section carries the attainder of these citizens; the second part of this provision, which appears as if it were a proviso, does not qualify the first section. The first section in itself is a complete bar to any of those who were so regarded by the Postmaster General and whose contracts were canceled to become effective February 19, 1934. Does the Congress understand what it is doing? I prophesy that the day will come when it will understand what it will have done if it shall pass this measure, and that the people of this country will make Congress understand it.

Now notice the harshness of this provision:

SEC. 8. Any company alleging to hold a claim against the Government on account of any air-mail contract that may have heretofore been annulled may prosecute such claim as it may have against the United States for the cancelation of such contract in the Court of Claims of the United States, provided that such suit be brought within 1 year from the date of the passage of this act—

And so forth.

There was no necessity for that provision in this measure. If its objective was to enable anyone to bring suit in the Court of Claims, that power exists now by general statute. The sole purpose of this provision found in the conference report is to put a limitation which is extraordinary, which is harsh and severe, and one under which no other contractors suffer. Why was that provision with all its circumlocution and all its verbiage written into the measure? It was to hide from the public the harshness and the severity of the act; to conceal from the casual reader that an effort was being made merely to save the face of a tyrannical Postmaster General.

This does wrong. This deprives the citizen of rights, and Congress is going to walk right into it and do this thing with eyes wide open.

What is the effect of the limitation? Of course, all the world would have understood it if the provision had stated that "the limitation upon action based upon cancelation of an air-mail contract is 1 year, and no action may be brought thereafter." But that was not done. The provision has been hidden under the guise of granting a right, and it is a mere guise, because the right exists today. Such a limitation is put upon the right of the citizen to assert his claim in the Court of Claims that he may lose it entirely, for the reason that he is already in some other court, and while he is in that other court he may not go into the Court of Claims; and by the time he gets out of that other court his year has gone by, and he has lost his right of action.

That is what Congress is about to do. I know full well that Senators realizing the complete import of that provision do not subscribe to it because it deprives citizens of ordinary, normal rights which they have always enjoyed until we arrived at this era when the trend of affairs is opposed to freedom, opposed to free institutions, opposed to justice, and in the direction of force, unlimited force, unregulated power.

Listen to the next clause:

SEC. 9. Each person desiring to bid on an air-mail contract shall be required to furnish in its bid a list of all the stockholders holding more than 5 percent of its entire capital stock, and of its directors, and a statement covering the financial set-up, including a list of assets and liabilities; and in the case of a corporation, the original amount paid to such corporation for its stock, and whether paid in cash, and, if not paid in cash, a statement for what such stock was issued. Such information and the financial responsibility of such bidder, as well as the bond offered, may be taken into consideration by the Postmaster General in determining the qualifications of the bidder.

With that list, and the check-up of Democrats and Republicans in the list, a check-up of those who contributed "to keep the Democratic donkey alive", as the testimony in the words of one of the witnesses expressed it, it is a very simple thing for a Postmaster General to assign, as a reason why he does not grant a contract to a contractor of an opposing political faith; that he is covered by something contained in the information. Does this provision specify what it is that shall disqualify the applicant for a contract? Not at all. This great power is granted with no limitation. The information must be furnished, and the Postmaster General is not limited to any particular information he finds therein. He may say, "I have found it, and I am not obliged to expose it; but it is satisfactory to me, and I deny the contract though you are entitled to it under the specifications and bid."

Does the Senate intend to grant this autocratic power? No, it does not; but it will, just as sure as fate, judging by the past experiences at this session of Congress.

There is a provision in section 13 which enforces compulsory arbitration. To be sure it is carefully concealed and perhaps very difficult to discover, but I read the section in order to submit to the Senate whether it is right as a matter of labor policy to enact such legislation as this:

SEC. 13. It shall be a condition upon the awarding or extending and the holding of any air-mail contract that the rate of compensation and the working conditions and relations for all pilots, mechanics, and laborers employed by the holder of such contract shall conform to decisions of the National Labor Board. This section shall not be construed as restricting the right of collective bargaining on the part of any such employees.

There we have it in a nutshell. Does any Senator believe that the workmen and workwomen of the country would subscribe to such a policy? I do not believe so, and yet the Senate is about to adopt compulsory arbitration so far as it affects this industry.

I now invite attention to section 15:

SEC. 15. After October 1, 1934, no air-mail contractor shall hold more than three contracts for carrying air mail, and in case of the contractor of any primary route, no contract for any other primary route shall be awarded to or extended for such contractor. It shall be unlawful for air-mail contractors, competing in parallel routes, to merge or to enter into any agreement, express or implied, which may result in common control or ownership.

There we have a policy diametrically opposed to that beautiful system which was operating perfectly up to February 19, 1934, a system under which we had by actual experience three great transcontinental lines, with extensions northerly and southerly, not only on the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts but throughout the country. They were operated and controlled by a single governing board as respects each one of the three different systems. An airship load of mail or passengers could be transported from ocean to ocean without stop, as was done in eleven and a fraction hours the last day that splendid system existed.

Now we are about to enact a law which would forbid any one contractor having more than three contracts. It would forbid him also to have more than one primary route. So we are reversing the policy. Why? Because it is good? Oh, no. No; there is not a Senator who has really studied the problem who is willing to admit that it is better to divide the cross-country routes among 3 or 4, or even 2 contractors, than it is to have 1 contractor operate the routes throughout from ocean to ocean. Oh, no; it is not public policy. That is not the purpose. It is politics. Politics is the objective.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. Is not the purpose of the particular provision to put out of business certain people who now hold contracts, and to get rid of them?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, of course the debate which we had here previously and the whole record of the evidence taken before the special committee show that the objective of those who brought all the political pressure to bear upon the Postmaster General's Office was to cancel extensions and contracts, so that men, who before had not had any contracts, could obtain contracts. Obviously, if we fix it so one contractor may not have more than three contracts, however short the routes may be, and so that he may not have more than one primary route, we multiply the number of opportunities to spread this largess—for the benefit of the public? Oh, no; but for the benefit of those who helped to keep the Democratic donkey alive.

There is another feature of the measure, Mr. President, to which I wish to invite attention. It will be observed that this measure is to take effect after October 1, 1934. In the meantime there are companies which are serving the country under temporary contracts, some of whom obtained contracts without having the necessary equipment and were obliged to equip themselves for the service; but under the proposed law on October 1, 1934, the Government, which we are supposed to represent on behalf of the people, is to take away contracts and take away rights. Is there any equivalent rendered? Oh, no; not a dollar. The property of the citizen is to be taken without any compensation at all. Is it for a public use? Not at all! It is for the private accommodation of other contractors.

So I claim that that provision of the conference report is directly in conflict with the due-process clause of the Constitution.

Section 16 relates to Canadian contracts. Mr. President, I wonder why they picked on Canada, and why they never mentioned South America, and never mentioned Mexico. Is it possible that this law is to be made to fit one of our foreign neighbors and not all of them? If we read the conference report, we see that that is what it means; and we are about to solemnly adopt this conference report with probably a vote of 20 in opposition to it, and all the rest of the Senate voting for it, and yet there is in the measure that irrational provision with respect to our relations with our neighbors. I read it:

The Postmaster General may provide service to Canada within 150 miles of the international boundary line, over domestic routes which are now or may hereafter be established, and may authorize the carrying of either foreign or domestic mail, or both, to and from any points on such routes, and make payment for services over such routes out of the appropriation for the domestic Air Mail Service: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as repealing the authority given by the act of March 2, 1929 (U.S.C., Supp. VII, title 39, sec. 465a).

I submit that if it is the purpose of Congress not to have that provision apply to any other country than Canada, it should be so expressed in the bill.

I now call attention to section 17:

The Postmaster General may cause any contract to be canceled for willful disregard of or willful failure by the contractor to comply with the terms of its contract or the provisions of law herein contained and for any conspiracy or acts designed to defraud the United States with respect to such contracts. This provision is cumulative to other remedies now provided by law.

And here we ourselves are about to exercise judicial powers. Congress cannot assume judicial powers, nor can it delegate any such powers to an executive officer, and yet that is what we undertake to do by that provision. I cite many cases which I ask permission to insert in the RECORD to support this dictum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAYDEN in the chair). Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Congress cannot assume judicial powers, nor can it delegate any such power to an executive officer (Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168; Andrews v. Hovey, 124 U.S. 717; Gordon's Case, 7 Ct. Cls. 1; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. 539; Angle v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 151 U.S. 20; Aldleman v. Booth, 21 How. 506).

Where a statute is susceptible of two constructions, by one of which grave and doubtful constitutional questions arise, and by the other of which such questions are avoided, the latter construction should be adopted (Texas v. Eastern Texas Ry. Co., 258 U.S. 204; Arkansas Gas Co. v. Railroad Commission, 261 U.S. 379).

The Constitution imposes upon the judicial department the solemn duty of interpreting the laws; and however disagreeable that duty may be, in cases where its own judgment shall differ from that of other high functionaries, it is not at liberty to surrender or to waive it (United States v. Dickson, 15 Pet. 162; Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346; United States v. Freund, 290 Fed. 411).

Mr. AUSTIN. Consider this phrase:

The Postmaster General may cause any contract to be canceled for willful * * * failure by the contractor to comply with * * * the provisions of law.

Who says what the law is under our system of government? Is it Congress? Not at all. The judiciary is the sole and exclusive department of government which may pass upon what we do here, and say what the law is. It has the exclusive authority to pass upon a controversy between the Government and one of its citizens relating to a contract, and to say what is the law which applies to that contract, and whether one side or the other is violating the law with respect to that contract. Yet we here, Senators many of us lawyers, many of us former judges, are about to enact legislation which undertakes to delegate to a Cabinet officer the power to pass upon what the law is, and to say whether or not a contractor is violating it. That is an obvious violation of the judicial power which has been vested solely in the judiciary.

Worse than that, and more directly affecting the contractor, it may take his rights away from him without any trial, without due process of law. The arbitrary flat of a Cabinet officer, issued as was that of February 9, 1934, may be repeated.

Why is such an extravagant law now proposed to be passed by the Congress? It is because a Cabinet officer had the temerity to exercise that power unlawfully heretofore, and we now must save his face. We now must declare that it was proper for him to take the action he took by writing into a new measure what appears to be an authority to do that very thing.

Ah, I say, the rational understanding of such a clause in this bill is that the Congress knows that it never before existed. It knows that the Postmaster General never before had this power to act without notice and without trial; and that is why it is now being stuck in this measure, in order to grant him that power. If he had that power before, under the section under which he claimed he had it, why is it undertaken now to give him that power? It is nothing but a face-saving gesture.

The trouble with this gesture is that it is not innocent. It is not without damage. The trouble is that when we break down a great principle of government, designed to preserve the liberties of the people, we do a damage that is almost irreparable. Were it not for the recuperative powers of the American people, were it not for their great civic virtue, which enables them to pass through such a period of tyranny as we are living in today and keep their heads, it would be irreparable; but because of that virtue and that recuperative power we shall see the day when these things will be condemned, and the condemnation will be so emphatic that it will be many centuries before any other administration again tries to put them into effect.

It is to be noticed, however, that when it comes to penalizing any citizen by a fine of $10,000, and imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both, as expressed in sections 18 and 19, the proposed legislation in effect provides for a trial. While it does not specifically provide for it, the bill seems to recognize the great American principle and institution of a finding of guilty by a judicial tribunal.

Mr. President, we have read this morning news of a decision in the District Supreme Court, rendered by Hon. Daniel W. O'Donoghue, Associate Justice, in which, if the report in the papers be correct, it was held that section 395 (o) of the public statutes, under which Postmaster General Farley canceled these contracts, was constitutional, and, therefore, that the court would not take jurisdiction of the case.

That statute has been discussed here, and the claim has been made by my colleague the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and myself that the statute, if ever intended to be interpreted as it is now interpreted by this court, amounts to a bill of attainder. I do not care to weary the Senate with a discussion again of that subject; but for the sake of those who may read the RECORD I recall to their memory the fact that it has been discussed, and a brief on it is already in the RECORD.

I wish to make one comment about that decision. No man respects our courts more than I. I do not challenge that decision on the floor of the Senate. I think it is bad taste for a Senator to undertake to deal with an absentee, whether he is a private citizen or a justice of a court, upon a specific matter like this; but I do call attention to the fact that nisi prius judges, when presented with a question of the constitutionality of a statute which is susceptible of two constructions, by one of which grave and doubtful constitutional questions arise, and by the other of which such questions are avoided, will always, and I think they ought to, adopt the construction which is in conformity with the constitutionality of the act. Moreover, I believe a nisi prius judge would have to have an extraordinary type of hardihood, he would have to have an extraordinary amount of moral courage in these days, in our times, when the trend of legislation and the trend of administration is such, and the trend indeed of judicial decision is such that the Constitution is being bowed down to the ground—I say, he would have to have extraordinary moral courage to stand up and declare in the first instance before him that a piece of legislation was unconstitutional.

Of course, we recognize that the Constitution imposes on him and the judicial department generally the solemn duty of interpreting the law, and, however disagreeable that duty may be, in cases, especially, where the judge's own judgment may differ from that of other high functionaries, such as a Postmaster General, he is, nevertheless, not at liberty to surrender it or to waive it. It is his duty, and in this instance he performed his duty; he passed upon the question of the constitutionality, and he declared for the constitutionality of the statute.

So far as this decision goes, it should be considered by all the people of the United States as a nisi prius decision, having the characteristics of a decision which will, in all likelihood, be reviewed by a higher tribunal, and by that great tribunal which is invested with the exclusive and final power and authority and duty to say what is a transgression of the Constitution, and to say, if there is legislation which directs force as a substitute for justice, and there is a Constitution which directs justice instead of force, that the Constitution shall prevail, that it shall be supreme over the statute.

There is still hope, in any event, whatever any court may do—and I have felt at times that there remained only one more thing to subvert entirely American institutions, and that is the overthrow of our courts—whatever may happen, even if our courts have so far weakened that they will not support the Constitution, I know that the other tribunal will be resorted to, and will render its judgment in saving the Constitution and saving the bill of rights.

LAURA GOLDWATER

Mr. BAILEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4253) for the relief of Laura Goldwater, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

The report was agreed to.

THE FOREIGN DEBTS AND REASONS ADVANCED FOR REFUSING PAYMENT OF INSTALLMENTS DUE

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it is no purpose of mine to intrude within this discussion for too long a time something of a matter not related that should displace what might be called the harmony of this debate.

I rise for the moment that I may address myself to a matter to which the public press of this morning referred, and with which the country at large is acquainted—the failure to pay the installments due on international debts, and the reasons advanced for the deliberate omission.

The President of the United States on yesterday had before this honorable body a message as to the international debts, the debts due the United States from certain of the debtor countries, where payments upon those debts under the contracts existing are due and payable. The message of the President was, upon the motion of the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the distinguished Senator now presiding over the Senate as the President pro tempore, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I have the honor to be a member. At a proper and appropriate time the committee will give such consideration to the message, and what accompanies it, as the circumstances will then justify.

In the meantime, in no wise invading upon the province of the honorable committee, I wish to make a comment upon what I regret to say has been a most regrettable assault upon the revival of friendships and confidences between the United States and its debtor nations, principally England and France.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. LEWIS. No; I thank the Senator. I shall occupy but a short time, and the incoming of the Senators so numerously indicates a complimentary audience.

Mr. President, certain representatives of the established and renowned Government of England in public place assert that the message of the President of the United States demanding payment of debts due is in the form of blackmail. I do not know how stand these honorable gentlemen in the homes where they live. I only know that it is so contrary to the manners of an English gentleman to allude to the conduct of any official of another government as being blackmail that I cannot conceive that the statesmen who are the authors of the remark, though occupying, as is reported, official positions, represent either the gentility of family of England or its decency of politics.

The other Government, sir—and I refer to France—finds it agreeable, through three of its political spokesmen, to charge that the message of the President of the United States has been sent to Congress for political purposes, that it may be used for such benefit as will follow in the approaching congressional elections.

From this floor a short while since I made brave to say such charge would be made against us, when we sought the payments, according to the due dates of the debts. I said that it would be asserted that the whole object was to serve some political purpose on the part of the administration. I then called attention to the fact that our honorable opponents upon general questions—those of whom we speak as the Republican side, ourselves on the Democratic side, between which there is some conflict on some measures—have unitedly presented at all times the fact that there never was a suggestion of party politics as influencing the action of the United States in merely demanding the payment of its just debts.

To use the words of President Coolidge, our honorable debtors employed the money; they had the use of it; or, to use the New England expression, as the eminent Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] invites me to recall as the expression of the ex-President, they "hired" the money; but as I do not wish to use the harsh expression of the honorable ex-President, I say that the present President of the United States calls the attention of the world to the fact that this Government is quite willing to have any proposition entertained which our honorable debtors desire to submit. He freely said to the world in his message that such proposition will be considered in the spirit of the friendship and fraternity which we wish ever to prevail in our relations with our debtors as governments.

It is to be deplored, sir, that the government of any debtor, having received so generous a message, lighted with so genial a temperament, and softened with so kindly an attitude, indicating that anything it might present looking to an alleviation of any burden it assumed to carry would be received with tolerance, liberality, and cooperation, shall meet it, through some of its officials, with the charge of "blackmail" on the part of a great government, its equal and its friend. More, sir, is it to be deplored that a great Government like that of England, whose friendship we seek and would like to possess and which, I trust, accepts our friendship with equal favor of its recognition and the consciousness of its power, should, as against such message, meet it with terms of such opprobrium. Behold how unfitted in every form and conception are the constructions to what would be called the language of statesmanship of statesmen or friendship of nations!

Mr. President, this is no time in the world for men of hasty thought or want of reflection to divide those who naturally have a common interest in the preservation of the just rights of man. This much let us concede, that the preservation of parliamentary government, if it is to be preserved in the world, will much depend upon that land of which we speak as the mother of parliaments—England—and which her coadjutors speak of as Britain, and this the United States of America. Little will be preserved of distinctive democratic rule or republican form of government or parliamentary procedure in legislation in the conducting by man of the shape and form of government if these two great governments of parliamentary existence shall, as between themselves, allow such expressions of opprobrium or that display of evil manners to defeat them in the common cause of the perpetuation of what may be called the "liberty of human action and the democracy of free government."

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. There is no doubt in the Senator's mind but that both the Governments of England and France put to a very good use the money which they borrowed from the Government of the United States? Is that not true?

Mr. LEWIS. I dare say the record discloses, and I will agree with the Senator from West Virginia, that the uses to which the money was applied were for the benefit of the debtors. The exact details of that use have been, in one form or the other, made manifest by different reports; and as to that I will agree with the Senator, I am sure, in such conclusion as he may reach upon his own standard of justice.

But, Mr. President, I am pressing upon you how thoughtless it is on the part of either of these Governments—our own or that of England—at this particular political hour in the affairs of the world, to allow the mere matter of a difference, possibly, in the sum of indebtedness or the method of its payment or the manner of its adjustment, to bring forth from those who assume to speak for the Government expressions which widen the chasm of controversy existing among the people of each land.

We, the public representatives, are not beguiled in one sense to resent, or deluded in another to fire animosity. We know that these expressions come forth from those who are not the spokesmen of their government. We know they come forth from men who either in hasty action explode themselves in expressions which they fancy are the definition of their feeling, or submitting them, sir, for the benefit of the locality in which they speak, for such uses as the temporary modes of politics often call for we may often justify.

But it is the people of the United States of America for whom I speak. They do not understand or adopt such attitudes as permissible. It is the people of Great Britain and of France for whom I speak. They do not understand the limitations applicable to such manifestations. Just at a time when we were getting closer and nearer to a common understanding of the joint needs of both nations in a great common cause of world preservation of freedom to have the eminent representatives of these Governments characterize the action of the President of the United States in terms which in ordinary political debate upon the hustings are rarely indulged in approbrium, sir, that no gentleman invites himself to make use of without the fear that another gentleman will not tolerate it or bear it—this is not a thing, sir, to be lightly held, nor to be overlooked in its effect upon the innocent, the citizens of both these countries.

Sir, these citizens should be the beneficiaries of the joint friendship of both and all nations joined in common cause, but it is these who are being deprived of such by that set of gentlemen who seem to have learned that now and then an apostrophe or a trope form of expression, however vulgar, is to be indulged, for that it gladdens their sense of vanity, they never considering the effect it has upon disrupting the reuniting ties that are now rewelding these two great countries.

It was not long ago, sir, that it fell to me to rise to this floor to bring forth a communication in the form of a letter which an eminent citizen of one of these countries wrote to the President of the United States, in which this eminent economist, historian, and literary genius proceeded to characterize the advisers of the President as being "half-baked" and his policies as "foolish", and made a direct allusion against United States Senators in terms and expressions which I am sure the respectability of England and the decency of its citizenship never would have approved. Why, now, sir, after that incident—most unjustified as it was, emboldened by an audacity inexcusable—should this new affront be repeated?

That, Mr. President, brings me to the conclusion of this observation, to ask what is the motive behind these citizens of this friendly Government to incite these animosities on the part of our people at a time like this, when our honorable President of the United States is striving in his message, by declaration, and officially by his conduct, to demonstrate to the world how glad we are to receive any proposition from any debtor in any form and to submit it, in pursuance of the act of Congress we have passed, to the Congress for dealing with as one friend deals with another?

Now, Mr. President, as to France, the condition is all the more deplorable. Where are we in this hour? It was but Sunday past when the representatives of this Government, without regard to distinction of party or pretense of political opposition, assembled in the House of Representatives and, under the leadership of the President of the United States, poured out their salutations of respect and veneration for the great citizen of France, the Marquis de La Fayette. After having set forth his virtues and declaimed splendidly, through the different officers of our Government, upon the qualities he represented, upon a citizenship noble in its kind, renowned in its character, we are met, sir, in the very first expression after that, by the insulting insinuation by those who assume to speak for the Government of France, that the President's message is a "farce", literally speaking; that it is a "clever political lie"; that its assertions have no foundations in sincerity; that it is an utterance hurled forth to the public "for the benefit of such political uses as in the coming congressional elections may be availing to him."

What kind of a man do our honorable friends feel that wise America has chosen as its President? We may differ upon his policies; we may contest them; we may contend they do not work the results that he dreamed—but the gentility of the individual is not the subject of debate. His honor as a man and his quality as a sincere gentleman cannot be the basis of dispute. Why should a foreign country find it agreeable, in return for an offer of friendship, to hold before the world that it is a pretense of a farce play in some drama which we in America liken to a vaudeville performance?

Mr. President, it is very high time that these honorable friends understand one plain truth: It is not the administration of the United States that seeks money from any debtor nation. The people lent this money to the Government. The Government then lent it to those who sought to borrow it.

The Government of the United States is asking its agents, the President and its Congress, please to collect its money. The agent is asking the debtor, "Will you please comply with the contract the best you can, that we may collect the money which we, as an agent of the people, took from them to lend you?"

There, sir, is the front and end of our offending.

These honorable governments abroad, I dare say—referring to its people especially—do not quite understand the relationships between the people and the Government, or between the States and the Union here; and we can easily conceive that through these misconceptions the ordinary citizen might misapply to us a term wholly inapplicable and very unjust. It is all under the misconceived idea of the President as director and dictator to the States and to their people. Therefore, to have eminent sources who appear to be spokesmen of a party within these governments, who do understand our complete political situation, send forth their declaration, calmly written, and then later, in interview, repeat it, which throws a blight upon the friendships which we hope to keep ever knit, is beyond our understanding and impossible for us to adopt or condone.

Now, Mr. President, I observe for the final suggestion, there comes to us through two certain sources of this Government a new bit of information from abroad, highly interesting, but nothing further. It takes on no form of solemnity, but partakes of humor well calculated to awaken the risibilities of those inclined to what may be called funmaking. It is that the Government of the United States, through its Congress, has just passed a law which enables the President of the United States to enter into a form of treaty-making to draw forth from other governments privileges of their trade with us and their barter by which they purchase our goods to the enrichment of the United States; that the suggestion of the President at this particular time that the debt is to be paid is merely a form of pressure upon those governments with whom it is understood an effort is to be made to have some reciprocity of treaty in behalf of trade; that the message is intended to intimate, "Gentlemen, if you will deal very broadly with us in allowing our goods to go in very large volume to your country, we shall see what can be done with a view of releasing a part of your debts. We can submit to Congress in a message the generosity you have disclosed as to this prospective trade which we invite by the treaty, and upon the basis of that compensation seek from the Government a return reward by remitting a portion of the indebtedness."

Mr. President, for myself I assert that no such proposition will ever be made by any President of the United States who can ever be elected by the people.

Without regard to what his party designation might be, there is no man in America who could be elevated to that place who could be guilty of such perfidy of faith, who, in such violence of imagination, could enter upon the proposal of so detestable a trade.

America will present to other nations such suggestions for the exchange of trade as she feels will be to the mutual advantage of both, but she will make no offer to sell the independence of her country, the rights of her people, or the debt due her citizens in return for any political favor by any people or commercial concession by any country.

Finally, sir, comes the intimation, and, as is known, reaching official quarters of this Government, as to "what shall be said if it is requested by America that certain debtor countries disarm?" I refer to present efforts in the convention called for the consideration of disarmament. It is intimated as though to say, "If your President meant in his message to indicate the cessation of expenditures referred to in the message for something of an unworthy character, intimating very clearly expenditures for the obnoxious purpose of unnecessary war and the preparation for conflict for the demolition of mankind and the devastation of civilization—if he meant to declare that such expenditure does not meet the approval of a Christian, civilized people, such as is represented by the United States of America—if your President of the United States meant that, then what have you to say, gentlemen, to the proposal that if we disarm, accepting your suggestion of disarmament, you proportionately will reduce the amount of the indebtedness this particular debtor owes you, to the amount of the value of our disarmament", and then to ask, "To what extent will you, the United States, disarm your indebtedness as against that if we disarm the armaments of warfare as against the world, including yourselves?"

Mr. President, I know this is very delicate ground. I am conscious of the admonition the bard speaks from the mouth of the humble to the great, saying, "Those who stand in high places are blown by many a blast, and should they fall they dash themselves to pieces"; but I speak for myself to say that the people of America never have elected a President of the United States who could have been of a character or kind who was of audacity to suggest to a nation to change its armament as some favor to our country without regard to that nation's national preservation and to its national defense.

Under no circumstances would a President of the United States of any party that our people would elevate to this distinguished ascendancy commit an affront to the privileges of another nation by offering it American money in turn for asking it to do a duty due to humanity. If due humanity, it will be sought by us as a mere encouragement in behalf of international human justice; if not due humanity, it is no province of ours to attempt to purchase the promise of doing that which was not due the land itself, or not due to us.

Sir, we have now no officer of this Government, and there is none that will receive the confirmation of this honorable body, who will barter American property to equalize indebtedness in consideration of a promise of some nation to reduce its armament. In the first place, such a promise would not be kept. I would applaud the nation that would disavow it, if it had been brought to the promise by such irregular, devious, and questionable means.

Finally, sir, any agreement of that kind from any nation might honestly be made at the time; and yet conditions might soon confront that nation which in its defense and preservation might call for a wholly different course; and who could blame it for promptly acting upon the emergency of self-preservation?

Now, sir, as to ourselves. I speak for myself. I decline to admit that any nation in this world has a right to sit in conclave with other nations, or alone in its own sovereignty, and dictate to the United States of America the limitation upon what is necessary for its self-defense. I pray God the time may never come when any conflict of war shall curse this, my home, my country; but if the hour is in the distance when the blackened clouds are flashing with the squirming fires that speak the flames of war, and if they shall spread to the misfortune and the affliction of this, the United States of America, this much be admonished: We prepare our defense, and we do it according to the sense of our preservation as directed by the conscience of America, as inspired by a sense of right and sustained by the sanctity of faith in God. America for her defense stands America; and while she gladly tests the suggestion made by any friendly nation, she will not tolerate the thought of a direction or domination of any nation or nations as to what shall be the limit and form and manner in which she shall prepare to defend herself against an emergency that might be on the way, whether in the imagination of her citizens or in the actual realization of the fear.

Mr. President, therefore I trust that it shall be now understood that America's presentation to her people through her President of the reasons by which we seek the payment of the debts due us is not for the oppression of any people; it is for the mere fulfillment of faith, the keeping of an honest contract made between the debtor and the creditor. I trust it may be understood, and here let it be asserted, if there be any nation in the world that fancies, through its statesmen, that by the imputation of dishonorable motive to the United States it can force us to withdraw from the determination of fulfilling our duties to our own countrymen, let that people awaken from their illusion, and realize that such cannot influence a people such as Americans. On the other hand, no resentments will be invited, no vengeance will be executed, no retaliation in the form of legislation will be permitted, far less invited, merely as a punishment to those whose lack of good sense or want of good manners make it agreeable to insult a people whose only offense was to tender every generous consideration that humanity among mankind might ask. We are America, and America is full on the way to the fulfillment of the laws of honor. With this consummation we will maintain the independence of the American citizen; with it we will preserve the sovereignty of America.

I thank the Senate.

REVISION OF AIR-MAIL LAWS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3170) to revise the air-mail laws.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, after listening to the eloquence and common sense of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] I hesitate to do so commonplace a thing as to make a reference to the rules of the Senate; but I am quite concerned over the pending conference report.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to reannounce the absences of the Senators as to whom I this morning gave detail and for the reasons I have stated, and to ask to have the announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, until last year when our party came into power in the Senate I had only two occasions to serve upon a conference committee. This year it so happens that I have served upon a number of conference committees. Many times in the conferences the question has arisen as to just how far the conferees could go in the use of new language. We have been embarrassed on a number of occasions, apparently under the rules, to be obligated to retain in a bill provisions which the conferees on the part of both Houses did not wish to retain.

Further than that, as Chairman of the Committee on Rules and the temporary custodian of the rules of the Senate, I think it is my duty to make some statement as to what has happened with reference to the measure now before us. I make these suggestions without reference to the merits of the bill. I am not qualified to speak regarding them.

The conferees have gone far afield in this conference report in adopting new language, language not found either in the text of the bill as it passed the House or in the text of the bill as it passed the Senate, and which, it seems to me, violates the spirit of both.

I invite the attention of the Chair to rule XXVII, paragraph 2, found at the top of page 34. I read:

2. Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses. If new matter is inserted in the report, or if matter which was agreed to by both Houses is stricken from the bill, a point of order may be made against the report, and if the point of order is sustained, the report shall be recommitted to the committee of conference.

Mr. President, I speak first of subsection (d) found on page 2 of the conference report, which reads as follows:

(d) The Postmaster General may designate certain routes as primary and secondary routes and shall include at least four transcontinental routes and the eastern and western coastal routes among primary routes.

It will be observed that as written in the conference report 6 primary routes are established, 4 transcontinental routes, and an eastern coastal route and a western coastal route, making 6 primary routes. The nearest approach to this language in the bill is found on page 3 of the bill as it passed the Senate, beginning in line 10:

The Postmaster General may designate certain routes as primary and secondary routes and may include at least four transcontinental routes.

That is the language which is repeated thus far in the conference report. But in addition to the language just quoted we find that the text of the bill as it passed the Senate definitely determined what transcontinental routes are, because, if Senators will refer again to page 3 of the bill, they will see that it describes the transcontinental routes and defines them in this language:

Extending to termini, as nearly as practicable, on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

That is to say, in order to be a primary route there would have to be a terminus at or near the Atlantic and a terminus at or near the Pacific or, in the language of the bill, page 3, "extending to termini, as nearly as practicable, on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts."

Mr. President, there is nothing in the bill as it passed the Senate or as it passed the House that suggested primary routes which are coastal in their operation, because both termini of a coastal route would be either on the Pacific coast or on the Atlantic coast, as the case may be, and not, as the language on page 3 indicates, with termini on both coasts or a terminus on each coast.

Mr. President, that is not all. If we take page 1 of the conference report, section 3, toward the bottom of the page, we find the insertion of the adjective "initial" in the phrase "for initial periods of not exceeding 1 year." That, I assume, might be regarded as a limitation. I am not sure but that under our rules that would be an acceptable amendment. Nevertheless, there is there the insertion of a word which does not appear either in the House bill or in the Senate bill.

We find in the third line from the bottom on page 1 of the conference report that the right of appeal is to the Comptroller General. If I am correct in the matter, the reference made in the bill as it passed the two Houses of Congress was to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and not to the Comptroller General.

On page 2 of the bill, practically all of subsection (g), if I am correct in my statement, is new or radically changed language.

On page 3, section 6, subsection (a), second line, the words "after notice and hearing" possibly might be considered a limitation; but I desire to make clear to the Senate that the conference report goes far beyond any report in which I have ever joined. I think there have been many times when I wanted to do this; I know there have been many times when I wanted to deviate from the language used by one or the other House, or both; but this conference report actually does go beyond the rule laid down to govern conferees in preparing conference reports.

Mr. President, conferences are difficult anyhow.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Has the Senator concluded the catalog of instances in which he thinks the conferees have exceeded their authority?

Mr. COPELAND. I simply touched upon those. If the Senator cares to add others, I shall be glad to have them for the sake of presenting the matter at length.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have only given the most cursory examination to the conference report with this thought in mind. I understood the Senator to refer to paragraph (g) on page 2. Am I right in that?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. I concur in the Senator's suggestion that that is very largely new matter, not contained in either bill, and that there is involved in it much more than language. It is a substantive change, as I conceive it.

I call the Senator's attention also to section 6 (a), on page 3. There is a provision there for notice and hearing.

Mr. COPELAND. I have made reference to that.

Mr. WHITE. So far as my knowledge goes, that is new matter inserted by the conferees.

Mr. COPELAND. That is new; but I thought possibly that might be considered a limitation, and in the application of the rule we have not hesitated to limit or delimit; yet, after all, that is new language.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that; and I would not be dogmatic about anything I now suggest to the Senator, because, as I indicated when I rose to interrogate him, I have not had the opportunity to study out these matters carefully.

Take subparagraph (b) of section 6: It strikes me that that is new, not contained in either Senate or House bill.

I refer next to subparagraph (c) under section 6, appearing on page 3, the language being—

Any contract which may hereafter be let or extended pursuant to the provisions of this act, and which has been satisfactorily performed by the contractor during its initial or extended period, shall thereafter be continued in effect for an indefinite period—

And so forth. I have the impression that there is nothing in either Senate or House bill which authorized the conferees to give these contracts an indefinite period of life.

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly that could not be considered a limitation. That would be a broadening of power.

Mr. WHITE. That would be an extension, I think.

I come now to paragraph (d) under section 6, also on page 3. I think the first part of that section is covered in the Senate bill. Beginning about the middle of the paragraph there is this language:

For the purposes of this section—

And so forth, to the conclusion of the subparagraph. I think that is new, both in form and in substance.

Going on to paragraph (e) under section 6, it says:

In fixing and determining the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for air-mail transportation, the Commission shall give consideration to the amount of air mail so carried—

And so forth. There may be a similar provision in the Senate bill or in the House bill; but, if there is, it has escaped my notice.

Going on to section 7 (a), the very first words of the section are—

After December 31, 1934.

I think that is new matter, fixing a different date for the application of this section than was fixed in the Senate bill or in any corresponding House provision.

I do not desire to inject myself further into the Senator's speech.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be glad if the Senator will give me any further references he has.

Mr. WHITE. Going on, then, near the bottom of page 4, I refer to the language in subparagraph (d) beginning about the middle of that paragraph:

That whenever required by the Postmaster General the bidder shall submit an affidavit executed by the bidder—

And so forth. So far as my knowledge of the Senate bill and the House bill goes, that is an entirely new provision.

Now we turn over to page 6, at the beginning of section 15. I think that section is very largely new matter, not comprehended within either the language or the purpose or the effect of any provision either in the Senate bill or in the House bill.

I repeat, Mr. President, that these comments of mine are based on a cursory examination. I think they are founded in fact, however, and that they clearly demonstrate the infirmity of the conference report.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his additions to the list I have made of what I regard to be deviations from the operation of the rule.

Mr. President, the matter may not be particularly serious as regards this bill. I am not prepared to argue that question at all.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has pointed out the new matter which has been inserted. I do not think there is any doubt about new matter having been inserted. I am of opinion that everybody will have to concede that. The conferees virtually rewrote the proposed legislation, but the question arose whether the manner in which they did it did not make the report in order, whether the conferees could, by a blanket performance, strike out one thing and insert entirely new matter, provided it referred to the same thing that was stricken out. That seems to be the basis on which the defense will be made that the report is in order.

There is a very striking precedent in which the Senate passed on that very subject, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him in order to state it.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. FESS. On February 19, 1925, when the famous Muscle Shoals legislation was before us, in which the Senators who are interested in the adoption of the pending conference report were also very much interested, as the Senator will recall, under the leadership of Mr. Underwood, the Senate passed a Muscle Shoals bill of its own.

Mr. COPELAND. I recall that.

Mr. FESS. The House passed what was called the "Ford purchase Muscle Shoals bill." The subject went to conference, and the conference agreed and reported to the Senate. Let me read what occurred:

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 518) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War, for national defense in time of war and for the production of fertilizers and other useful products in time of peace, to sell to Henry Ford, or a corporation to be incorporated by him, nitrate plant no. 1, at Sheffield, Ala.; nitrate plant no. 2, at Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Waco quarry, near Russellville, Ala.; steam power plant to be located and constructed at or near Lock and Dam No. 17 on the Black Warrior River, Ala., with right-of-way and transmission line to nitrate plant no. 2, Muscle Shoals, Ala.; and to lease to Henry Ford, or a corporation to be incorporated by him, Dam No. 2 and Dam No. 3 (as designated in H.Doc. 1262, 64th Cong., 1st sess.), including power stations when constructed as provided herein, and for other purposes.

That is the report which was under consideration. When it came in, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] made a point of order on the report, and made this statement:

I want, first, to call attention to this fact, that we have a condition presented to the Senate which probably has never before been presented, and if any claim is made that the point of order I urge against this conference report is technical, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it is only by the greatest of technicality that the conferees are allowed any latitude whatever in bringing in a conference report and making changes from the bill as it passed the Senate.

* * * * * * *

The House passed what is known as the "Ford bill", giving Muscle Shoals to a corporation to be organized by Henry Ford. Mr. Ford has withdrawn his offer, as everybody in the country knows, and the House is not trying to pass the Ford bill. So the conferees only by virtue of a technicality had any House bill whatever in considering this question.

* * * * * * *

Technically, the conferees have a right to bring in anything between the Ford bill and the bill as it passed the Senate, so it is by virtue only of a technicality that the conferees have any latitude whatever. I think it is proper for the Chair to take that into consideration in passing on the point of order, which necessarily must be more or less technical.

As a matter of parliamentary laws, the conferees have a right to bring in any provision of the bill as it passed the Senate or any provision of the Ford bill, or any provision between those two bills. They cannot, of course, go beyond that.

With those preliminary remarks, I want to call the attention of the Chair to what to me seems a very simple proposition. For the purpose of convenience, I am using the Senate print.

Then the Senator proceeded to read what was in the Senate bill, what was in the House bill, and what was in the conference report, to show that the conference report did not coincide with what was in the House bill or the Senate bill or between the two. He claimed they went beyond their authority in not dealing with what was in the House bill or what was in the Senate bill or what fell between them.

I do not think I care to take the time to read what was in the House bill and in the Senate bill and in the conference report. The Senator proceeded:

Mr. President, I take it that as between the Senate bill, which provided for the payment of a rental of 4 percent on the entire cost of the dam, including the locks, and the House bill, which provided for 4 percent on the entire cost of the dam in the same way with only an exception that it should not apply to expenditures made prior to a certain date, there is no place between those two provisions where we can put the provision of the bill as reported by the conference committee. In other words, the conference committee, for instance, it is conceded, would not have any right to bring in a bill that provided for a lease of 125 years, because that would be more than the Ford bill and more than the Senate bill. They could not bring in a bill that should provide for the payment of a rental that would be more than both the other bills or less than the other bills.

The length of time would have to fall between the two, and the amount of rental would have to fall between the two, not above both of them or below both of them.

Moreover, the conference report gives to the President the right, without stating the amount, to deduct a still further amount from the cost of the dam as he shall determine is a sufficient amount to pay for navigation on the Tennessee River.

He proceeded to elaborate on the argument that authority was given by the conferees to the President which was not included in either of the two bills or did not fall between the two bills. The argument proceeded. I think it is hardly justifiable for me to continue to read, except just to suggest the principles. I do not care to read the details.

It appears that the very principle involved in the conference report before us is as to whether, having before them a Senate bill and a House amendment in the nature of a substitute, the authority of the conferees is broad enough to cover the insertion of something not in either bill; and there seems to be no doubt that new matter was inserted.

The debate on the Muscle Shoals matter ran for days. A point of order was made on the 19th of February, it was discussed all day the 19th, and was discussed on the 20th. The debate is found on page 4126 of volume 66, part 4, Sixty-eighth Congress, second session. The second page to which I refer is page 4243.

Senator Underwood conceded that new matter was inserted. He stated:

Mr. President, on yesterday, just as the Senate took a recess, the Chair called to my attention an addition to section 2 of the pending bill and asked what authority the conferees had to insert that section. I desire to call to the attention of the Chair that in the original bill, in section 5, the following language is found:

"The lease shall also provide the terms and conditions under which the lessee may sell and dispose of the surplus electric power created at said plants."

That language was stricken out, but the paragraph was rewritten and the language reinserted. The Chair should consider that it was in conference that—

"The lease shall also provide the terms and conditions under which the lessee may sell and dispose of the surplus electric power created at said plant."

The original Ford bill, on page 15 of the printed bill, in section 16, had this language:

"For the facilities and services aforesaid the United States shall protect the company from losses occasioned by such use and shall return the said property in as good condition as when received and reasonably compensate the company for the use thereof."

I mention this to indicate that it was conceded that the matter was new, but it was contended it was covered by the broad authority given.

When the final decision was made as to the authority of the conferees to insert that matter under the practice under which they were operating, the decision sustained the point of order, namely, that they had no authority to do it even in that form. The vote came on the 23d of February on an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The point which had been made was based on what the Senator read just a moment ago, paragraph 2 of rule XXVII:

Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses. If new matter is inserted in the report, or if matter which was agreed to by both Houses is stricken from the bill, a point of order may be made against the report, and if the point of order is sustained, the report shall be recommitted to the committee of conference.

Upon that rule the Chair sustained the point of order, an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair, and the Chair was sustained by a vote of 45 to 41, as is found on page 4402 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 66, part 5, Sixty-eighth Congress, second session.

This is a decisive precedent, precisely bearing on the subject now before the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I was in the Senate at the time of the debate to which reference is made, and I recall the discussion and the incidents mentioned by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. President, it is perfectly clear to me that paragraph 2 of rule XXVII has been violated. The question is, What should be our attitude toward the rules of the Senate? These rules are the outgrowth of years of experience in the Senate, they have been carefully formulated, most of them have stood the test of time, and they have facilitated the operations of legislation.

I think it is a great mistake for us to accept a report which is so clearly in violation of the rule as is the one before us. It violates the rule not only in the specific case which I mentioned in the first place, by providing for six primary routes instead of four, but in the other instances which I suggested, and the many which were presented to the Senate by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. President, I should not feel true to my trust if I did not call the attention of the Chair and of the Senate to the situation. It is my judgment that rule XXVII has been violated, and I feel it my duty to raise the point of order against the submission of the conference report.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the Presiding Officer desire to have a statement made? I shall be very happy to make it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would be glad to hear from the Senator briefly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the first objection is that the following paragraph is new matter: On page 2 of the conference report, subsection (d) reads as follows:

(d) The Postmaster General may designate certain routes as primary and secondary routes and shall include at least four transcontinental routes—

Listen to that:

at least four transcontinental routes, and the eastern and western coastal routes among primary routes. The character of the designation of such routes shall be published in the advertisements for bids, which bids may be asked for in whole or in part of such routes.

I now read from page 3 of the Senate bill, line 10:

Provided further, That the Postmaster General may designate certain routes as primary and secondary routes and may include at least four transcontinental routes, extending to termini, as nearly as practicable, on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, as primary routes. All other routes shall be secondary routes. The character of the designation of such routes shall be published in the advertisements for bids, which bids may be asked for in whole or in part of such routes.

I digress long enough to say that the House struck out all except the enacting clause, and substituted therefor a new bill. Both bills provide for substantially the same thing; one provides for at least four transcontinental routes, and the other bill provides that there shall be six transcontinental routes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Chair at that point? Where is the language of the House bill which refers to primary and secondary routes?

Mr. McKELLAR. There is nothing in the House bill with reference to that. That language is in the Senate bill.

I now come to the next section, section (g), which was objected to. I ask the Chair to turn to page 15 of the bill. Here is the language of the conference report:

(g) Authority is hereby conferred upon the Postmaster General to provide and pay for the carriage of mail by air in conformity with the terms of any contract let by him prior to the passage of this act, or which may be let pursuant to a call for competitive bids therefor issued prior to the passage of this act, and to extend any such contract for an additional period or periods not exceeding 9 months in the aggregate at a rate of compensation not exceeding that established by this act nor that provided for in the original contract: Provided, That no such contract may be so extended unless the contractor shall agree in writing to comply with all the provisions of this act during the extended period of the contract.

On page 15 in the House bill it is provided:

SEC. 3. (a) The Postmaster General is authorized to award contracts for the transportation of air mail by airplane between such points as he may designate, and for periods of not exceeding 1 year, to the lowest responsible bidders tendering sufficient guaranty for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement at fixed rates per airplane-mile. The base rate—

And so forth. That is dealing with the same subject. The language is different, but the same subject is dealt with.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Is not the language which the Senator has just read the language which is found in section 3 (a) of the conference report?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is found there, yes, making the case that much stronger, because they are similar.

Mr. WHITE. In other words, the language which the Senator has just read from the House bill is the provision which is covered by paragraph 3 (a) of the conference report, and then paragraph (g) is something new.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the Senator is mistaken about that.

I now come to page 3, section 6 (a):

SEC. 6. (a) The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed, after notice and hearing, to fix and determine by order, as soon as practicable and from time to time, the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for the transportation of air mail by airplane and the service connected therewith over each air-mail route, but not in excess of the rates provided for in this act, prescribing the method or methods by weight or space, or both, or otherwise, for ascertaining such rates of compensation, and to publish the same, which shall continue in force until changed by the said Commission after due notice and hearing.

I now read from section 6 of the Senate bill, on page 4——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So far as that point is concerned, the Chair does not think the Senator needs to spend any time on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will pass on.

Section 6 (b) of the conference report provides:

(b) The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed, at least once in every calendar year from the date of letting of any contract, to review the rates of compensation being paid to the holder of such contract, in order to be assured that no unreasonable profit is resulting or accruing therefrom.

The Interstate Commerce Commission in the Senate bill is—Hereby empowered and directed to fix and determine, as soon as practicable, the public convenience and necessity for all air transportation routes and the fair and reasonable future rates of compensation for the transportation of such mail matter by airplane common carriers and the service connected therewith, but not in excess of the rates herein provided for, prescribing the method or methods by weight or space or both, or otherwise, for ascertaining such rates of compensation, and to publish the same, and orders so made and published shall continue in force until changed by the Commission after due notice and hearing and shall take effect on such route immediately after the expiration of any outstanding air-mail contracts then in force and effect under existing contracts made by the Post Office Department.

The two sections are substantially the same. The wording is virtually the same in every respect.

I now come to section 6 (c) in the conference report:

(c) Any contract which may hereafter be let or extended pursuant to the provisions of this act, and which has been satisfactorily performed by the contractor during its initial or extended period, shall thereafter be continued in effect for an indefinite period, subject to any reduction in the rate of payment therefor, and such additional conditions and terms, as the said Commission may prescribe, which shall be consistent with the requirements of this act; but any contract so continued in effect may be terminated by the said Commission upon 60 days' notice, upon such hearing and notice thereof to interested parties as the Commission may determine to be reasonable; and may also be terminated by the contractor at its option upon 60 days' notice.

I did not catch the force of the argument which was made on that point. Exactly the same power is contained in the Senate bill, but this language merely amplifies it.

Section (d), on page 3 of the report, is next objected to. The language is almost exactly like that on page 5 of the Senate bill. There is practically no difference.

Section (e) is also objected to. I read:

(e) In fixing and determining the fair and reasonable rates of compenstion for air-mail transportation, the Commission shall give consideration to the amount of air mail so carried, the facilities supplied by the carrier, and its revenue and profits from all sources, and from a consideration of these and other material elements, shall fix and establish rates for each route which, in connection with the rates fixed by it for all other routes, shall be designed to keep the aggregate cost of the transportation of air mail on and after July 1, 1938, within the limits of the anticipated postal revenue therefrom.

Let us now look at page 5 of the Senate bill, from which I read:

In fixing and determining the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for such transportation of mail matter by airplane, the Commission shall not include in such rates, or provide in addition thereto, any compensation by way of subsidy or other similar payment.

There is a slight modification of language, but no change at all in substance.

I now come to the authorities, Mr. President. The authorities are ample that where the House has struck out all except the enacting clause it opens up the matter to the extent of permitting anything which is germane to the provision, and the language can be changed or altered so as to carry out and make effective the result.

I read from several decisions in the Senate. On February 8, 1927——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that that is the well-settled rule in the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree entirely with the Chair. I desire to say that if the Chair does not wish to hear me I should like to insert in the RECORD at this place the five opinions which hold that where either body of Congress strikes out all of a bill except the enacting clause, the conference committee may put in the bill whatever is germane in either bill. There is not a word in the report that is not germane to some provision either in the Senate bill or in the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the rulings referred to by the Senator from Tennessee will be inserted in the RECORD.

The rulings referred to, taken from the Senate Journal, are as follows:

[69th Cong., 2d sess.]

On February 3, 1927, the Senate was considering the conference report on the radio bill (H.R. 9971) when Mr. Howell raised a question of order that the clause repealing the joint resolution approved December 8, 1926, limiting the time for which licenses for radio communication may be granted, was not in the bill as passed by the House of Representatives or the Senate and therefore it was new matter inserted contrary to rule XXVII.

The Presiding Officer (Mr. Oddie in the chair) overruled the point of order, as follows:

"The Chair is prepared to rule on the matter, and holds that where one House strikes out all after the enacting clause of a bill and inserts new language, as was done in this case, the conferees are given wider latitude in dealing with the subject; and matter that is germane to the matter in dispute may be dealt with by the conferees without subjecting the report to the point of order that the conferees have exceeded their authority in inserting new matter."

Mr. Howell appealed from the decision of the Chair, but later withdrew the same and raised a question of order that the joint resolution referred to in the point of order previously raised by him had been passed by Congress some weeks after the conferees had begun consideration of the differences between the two Houses; that the said joint resolution was not contemplated by either House at the time the radio bill was passed, and therefore was new matter inserted by the conferees and that any reference thereto in the report, even in the way of a repeal, rendered the conference report subject to a point of order.

The Vice President (Charles G. Dawes) overruled the point of order.

Mr. Howell appealed from the decision of the Chair, and the appeal was laid on the table by the vote of 48 yeas and 14 nays.

On February 8, 1927, while the Senate was further considering the conference report on the radio bill, Mr. Howell raised a question of order that the conferees had exceeded their authority in striking from the conference report certain matter agreed to by both Houses, as follows: "(with due consideration of the right of each State to have allocated to it, or to some person, firm, company, or corporation within it, the use of a wave length for at least one broadcasting station located or to be located in such State, whenever application may be made therefor)."

order, as follows:

"The Chair would remark that when the amendment of the Senate is a new bill in the nature of a substitute instead of various amendments to different parts of the bill, the whole status of conference is changed under the precedents. Under the line of argument which the Chair followed the other day in holding that new matter when germane could be put in as an amendment under those circumstances, he would seem to be justified now in overruling the point of order. The status of conference being changed where the Senate substitutes a bill as an amendment, the precedents in effect hold that the restrictions of rule XVII, paragraph 2, do not apply, and he so rules. The point of order is not well taken."

Mr. PITTMAN appealed from the decision of the Chair, and subsequently Mr. PITTMAN'S appeal was laid on the table by a vote of 41 yeas and 34 nays.

[68th Cong., 2d sess.]

February 19, 1925, the conference report on the Muscle Shoals bill (H.R. 518) was under consideration. Mr. NORRIS made a point of order that the conferees, in certain instances named, had exceeded their authority by inserting new matter.

The President pro tempore (Mr. Cummins, of Iowa), in a somewhat lengthy opinion, sustained the point of order. The Chair stated that he disregarded the House bill in the ruling on the ground that the two Houses had not agreed upon any point or upon anything. With reference to "new matter", the Chair said:

"What is 'new matter'? It is quite impossible to define this phrase with that accuracy and precision which will make any rule announced applicable to the infinite variety of cases that will arise. * * * It has seemed to the Chair that the words 'new matter', as found in rule XXVII, and 'new legislation', as found in rule XVI, must mean practically the same thing. The fact of the identity of these two phrases makes it all the more important that the ruling upon the points of order now before the Senate shall be correct. Without attempting to define 'new matter', the Chair is of the opinion that it was intended, when this paragraph of the rule (rule XXVII) was adopted, to restrict the general parliamentary law as frequently announced by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. * * * The Chair does not desire to be understood as holding that every change made in the Senate bill by the conference report constitutes 'new matter.' It is of the opinion that in order to bring the change within the spirit of rule XXVII 'new matter' must be of substantial import, that is to say, a change affecting in a substantial way the plan proposed in the Senate bill * * *."

An appeal was sustained—45 yeas, 41 nays. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 68th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 4124–4137, 4243–4250, 4310–4314, 4321–4326.)

[Feb. 24, 1927, 69th Cong., 2d sess.]

The Senate had under consideration the conference report on H.R. 16462, the general deficiency appropriation bill, when Mr. MCKELLAR made the point of order that the language inserted by the conferees as a substitute for Senate amendment no. 8 was new matter and violated rule XXVII.

Senate amendment no. 8 was an insertion as follows:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation (for refunding taxes illegally collected) shall be used to pay any claim in excess of $50,000 until such claim shall be approved by the Comptroller General of the United States in accordance with existing law."

The matter inserted by the conferees as a substitute is as follows:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for paying any claim allowed in excess of $75,000 until after the expiration of 60 days from the date upon which a report giving the name of the person to whom the refund is to be made, the amount of the refund, and a summary of the facts and a decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is submitted to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation."

The Vice President (Charles G. Dawes) overruled the point of order.

Mr. MCKELLAR appealed from the decision, when his appeal was laid on the table by a vote of 39 yeas and 28 nays.

[June 6, 1932, 72d Cong., 1st sess.]

The Senate had under consideration the conference report on H.R. 10236, the Revenue Act of 1932.

Mr. Howell raised the following point of order:

"1. That, with respect to Senate amendment no. 180, imposing a tax upon energy sold by private electric-power companies, the conferees had exceeded their authority by including in their report a provision for a tax, not authorized by either the Senate or the House of Representatives, on domestic and commercial consumption of energy supplied by publicly owned power plants; and

"2. That the conferees had exceeded their authority by imposing the tax, provided for in the section, upon the person paying for such electrical energy instead of upon the vendor, as contemplated by the Senate."

After debate,

The Vice President (Charles Curtis) overruled the point of order in the following language:

"The Senate amendment is as follows:

"'There is hereby imposed upon energy sold by privately owned, operating electric-power companies a tax equivalent to 3 percent of the price for which so sold.'

"There is no provision in the Senate amendment relative to the payment of the tax by either the vendor or the purchaser, although it was doubtless the intent of the Senate that the tax should be paid by the power companies themselves. However, in a parliamentary sense, the conferees, in the absence of specific instructions by the Senate, undoubtedly have the right, in the interest of adjusting differences between the two Houses, to take the action they did in providing for payment by the purchaser.

"There is no provision in the House bill on the subject of power sold by electrical companies. Therefore, there are no restrictions upon the power of the conferees, subject, of course, to the limitations of the rule itself, in dealing with this matter. They have broader latitude and authority than would otherwise be the case. They are empowered to make any change or modification that is germane or relevant.

"The term 'new matter' contained in the rule embraces, as the Chair thinks, matter that is entirely irrelevant to the subject matter.

"The point of order is overruled."

Mr. Howell appealed from the decision of the Chair, which decision was sustained by the vote of 42 yeas, 33 nays.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator has referred to some comments made by the Senator from New York and me, but he has not made reference to some other matters touched upon in our criticism of the report.

Mr. MCKELLAR. If the Senator will indicate to what he refers, I shall be glad to make response.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from New York, as I recall, referred to the insertion of the word "initial" in section 3 (a) which reads:

The Postmaster General is authorized to award contracts for the transportation of air mail by airplane between such points as he may designate, and for initial periods—

And so forth. The language of the Senate bill was "and for periods."

Mr. MCKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that it is hairsplitting to make such a distinction between "periods" and "initial periods"? The word "initial" is a qualification of the word "periods", and it seems to me that it is splitting hairs to try to send back a conference report that has been worked over for weeks and months on a hair-splitting proposition of that kind.

Mr. WHITE. So far as sending the report back to conference goes, I am free to confess that I would not expect a much better report if it should go back than we now have. That is why I myself did not make a point of order.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I think the Senator acted wisely in the matter, and I commend him for it.

Mr. WHITE. I was interested in the Senator's explanation, rather than in my own, of the inclusion of the word "initial." But to pass on from that, in section 3 (a), the proviso reads:

Provided, That where the Postmaster General holds that a low bidder is not responsible or qualified under this act, such bidder shall have the right to appeal to the Comptroller General—

The Senate bill provided that an appeal should lie to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Senator did not comment on that. It strikes me, for whatever my opinion may be worth, that that is a change not only in language, but in substance, from the provisions adopted either by the House or by the Senate.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator would not say that that language does not provide for an appeal, would he? It provides for a quick method of appeal under the circumstances set out in the section.

Mr. WHITE. The Senate bill provided for an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was the judgment of the Senate that that was the tribunal to which the appeal should be made. Now, apparently the conferees have determined that the Senate was wrong in that instance, and it is their conclusion that the appeal should be made to some other body or some other person. They may be right, but it is just a question as to whether they have the authority to override the Senate in that particular. That is why I am calling the attention of the Chair to it.

Mr. MCKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I will ask him to look at the bottom of page 15, line 19, of the House text.

Mr. WHITE. I have not the text of the House bill before me.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Listen to this; and the Senator will see how utterly mistaken he is in this point:

(b) In case of a determination by the Postmaster General that any bidder is not responsible or is otherwise disqualified under the terms of this act, such determination shall be subject to review in any manner authorized by law.

Surely, under those circumstances we had a right to make it specific.

Mr. WHITE. I do not know that there is authority of law at present for an appeal to the Comptroller General from the decision of the Postmaster General as to whether a bidder is or is not responsible. If that is the law, then I subside as to that particular point.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I do not think there is any doubt in the world about it.

Mr. WHITE. I do not want to trespass unduly on the Senator's patience——

Mr. MCKELLAR. I am glad to have the Senator make any objection he desires.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator has commented on paragraph (d) on page 2 of the conference report, and I freely confess that I am impressed with what he has said with respect to that particular paragraph. I am not going to quarrel with him about that, though I think it is a matter of doubt.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I think, if the Senator will examine them as I have, he will come to the same conclusion about the other objections.

Mr. WHITE. I think it is a matter of doubt, but I think in this particular and rare instance the Senator is right in his construction.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for thinking that for once I am right.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator did not comment on paragraph (e), which provides that—

> If on any route only one bid is received—

There shall be a certain procedure. I do not know whether the Senator overlooked that in his comment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not had that called to my attention previously, as I recall.

Mr. WHITE. There is in the Senate bill a provision that if the Postmaster General holds that the low bidder is not responsible, which is part of the matter in this paragraph, there shall be an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall speedily determine the issue, and its decision shall be final. A part of that is incorporated in paragraph (e).

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it is merely an elaboration of the provision in the Senate bill.

Mr. WHITE. An elaboration and an addition, Mr. President, in my view.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not agree to that.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator has referred to paragraph (b) on page 3 and commented on the first part of it; I am not impressed with his comment, but he failed to mention the language at the end of that paragraph, which reads:

> In determining what may constitute an unreasonable profit the said Commission shall take into consideration all forms of gross income derived from the operation of airplanes over the route affected.

I know of no provision like that in either the House or Senate bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was an elaboration of the provisions of the House and Senate bills; that is all. It carries out the intent and purpose of the original Senate provision.

Mr. WHITE. It all hinges on the definition of "elaboration." I know that the word "elaboration" may be used to cover up the sins of the conference committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know the conference committee were guilty of a great many sins, but I do not believe that to be one of them.

Mr. WHITE. I will mention section 7 (a), at the top of page 4. As this proposed legislation passed the House and passed the Senate this section and all other sections became applicable when the bill became a law. Here is a departure from that provision and a determination by the conference committee of some other and some definite date on which this particular section shall become applicable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it is a different date.

Mr. WHITE. I do not know whether the Senator was saying that that was an elaboration or not. It might or it might not be an extension, or it might be called an "elaboration."

Mr. McKELLAR. No; that is not an elaboration, but it is fixing of the date of the effectiveness of the section. That is done in conference all the time. There is no reason in the world why that may not be done.

Mr. WHITE. The Congress does it very often, but here both the House and the Senate, in the form in which this proposed legislation was adopted by them, made the legislation as a whole and every section of it a law upon the enactment of the legislation and the approval thereof by the President. The conference committee have fixed some other date for this particular section, and they have fixed some other date for another section of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. The House had done the same thing. If the Senator will permit me, if he will look at page 14 of the House amendment, he will see that section 2 was made effective July 1, 1934.

Mr. WHITE. Then the conferees have extended it beyond that date.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question now under inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is trying to determine the point of order raised by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], and therefore is desirous of listening to the argument.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. May I suggest, in response to what the Senator from Maine has said, that the Senate bill provided that after July 1 it should become effective; the House bill did not make it effective at all. Therefore there was a difference between the House and the Senate. They said they would not agree to the Senate bill if we made it effective July 1, but since their provision was ad infinitum they would agree if we would postpone it until December. If that is not the adjustment of a difference between the two Houses, I fail to see how there could be one.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me the objection is hypercritical, to say the least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The Chair will say in that connection and on that point that last week the conferees on the stock-market bill fixed July 1 as the effective date of the act, when both the House and the Senate bill provided that it should be effective upon the date of its enactment. So, while no point of order was raised against it—and the present occupant of the chair does not know that it would have been sustained if it had been raised—it has been done.

The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has been trying to compare the House and Senate bills while the argument has been in progress. It is not easy to do because the sections do not correspond. It is a well-recognized rule where either House strikes out the language of the bill sent to it by the other House and inserts language of its own, the conferees have a wider field for the adjustment of differences than they would ordinarily have where the bill passed by one House is amended by the other House section by section. In that case it is easy for the conferees to determine just what the specific differences are, where part of the language of a House bill or a Senate bill is stricken out and new language inserted; but where either House strikes out all the language of the bill coming to it from the other body and inserts its own language, necessarily, in order to reach an agreement and adjust the differences, there must be more flexibility and power existing in the conferees. That has been for a long time recognized in the rules of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

Where the language in either bill which is stricken out is indefinite or where there is no reference at all to the subject matter as to which the other House inserts language, then the conferees have almost unlimited power, so long as their amendments are germane to the proposal of either the House or the Senate bill.

The Chair does not think the insertion of the word "initial", referred to by the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], constitutes such a departure as would vitiate the conference report on that account. While the language in neither bill contained the word "initial", the bill as written by the conferees, using the word "initial", does not apparently or substantially change the effect of the language contained in both the House and the Senate bills.

With reference to the point of order made against subsection (d) of section 3, it seems that the Senate bill provided that the Postmaster General might designate certain routes as primary and secondary routes and might include at least four transcontinental routes, without further reference to eastern or western primary routes. The Chair does not think the use of the word "may" the second time has any effect whatever. The Postmaster General had full discretion, under the language of the Senate bill, to establish such primary and secondary routes as he might see fit.

In the absence of any language in the House bill on the subject either permitting or prohibiting the Postmaster General from establishing primary and secondary routes, the Chair is of the opinion that he could do that even under the language of the House bill by regulation, because there is nothing in the bill to prevent it.

There being no language in the House bill on the subject, and the insertion of the words "eastern and western coastal routes" being germane to the four routes already provided for in the Senate bill, the Chair does not think that inserts new matter to such an extent as to vitiate the conference report.

For the same reasons stated with reference to the other point of order, the Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] who made the point of order has been called from the Chamber. If he should desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair may he do so later when he returns to the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Provided no intervening business has been transacted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then I suggest the absence of a quorum in order to bring the Senator from New York back to the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Johnson	Pope
Ashurst	Cutting	Kean	Reynolds
Austin	Davis	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Dickinson	King	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	La Follette	Schall

Borah	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Brown	George	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	Gibson	McNary	Thompson
Bulow	Glass	Metcalf	Townsend

Carey	Hastings	Nye	Walcott
Connally	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Walsh
Coolidge	Hatfield	Overton	Wheeler
Copeland	Hayden	Patterson	White
Costigan	Hebert	Pittman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that I was called from the Chamber to a committee meeting which seemed to be an urgent one. I assume, from what I have been told, that the Chair overruled the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to ask the Chair a question, and I do this with all deference and respect. In making his decision I assume he took into consideration the rule as it is written, followed the language of the two bills and the conference report, and, in the light of that language, decided that the conference report was not subject to the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that he undertook briefly to give his reasons for the decision rendered, on the ground that where either House strikes out all of the bill after the enacting clause and inserts new language, the conferees have a much wider field for the adjustment of differences than where sections of the bill passed by either House are amended without striking out the entire language.

There are many decisions which the Chair could have cited, but he did not take the time to do so. In view of the Senator's absence, however, the Chair feels that it is not inappropriate now to refer to the decision rendered by Vice President Curtis.

During the consideration in the Senate of the Revenue Act of 1932 an amendment was inserted levying a tax upon electrical energy without saying by whom it should be paid; but evidently the text indicated that it should be paid by the producer of the electrical energy. There was no such provision in the House bill. When the bill went to conference the conferees amended the Senate language so as to provide that the tax should be paid by the consumer of the electrical energy. A point of order was made against the conference report on that ground; and Vice President Curtis, in overruling the point of order, used this language, after reciting the facts:

> There is no provision in the Senate amendment relative to the payment of the tax by either the vendor or the purchaser, although it was doubtless the intent of the Senate that the tax should be paid by the power companies themselves. However, in a parliamentary sense the conferees, in the absence of specific instructions by the Senate, undoubtedly have the right, in the interest of adjusting differences between the two Houses, to take the action they did in providing for payment by the purchaser.
> There is no provision in the House bill on the subject of power sold by electrical companies. Therefore there are no restrictions upon the power of the conferees, subject, of course, to the limitations of the rule itself in dealing with this matter. They have broader latitude and authority than would otherwise be the case. They are empowered to make any change or modification that is germane or relevant.

The Chair held that no new matter had been inserted by the conferees within the real meaning of the rule, and that so long as the amendments which the conferees inserted in the Senate language were germane to that language they did not violate the rule with reference to the power of conferees, and, therefore, he overruled the point of order.

Mr. COPELAND. I appreciate the courtesy of the Chair. I must say, in all frankness——

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to call the Chair's attention to page 207 of the Senate Manual, where it says:

> Conferees may not include in their report matters not committed to them by either House.

And it says further:

> In the Senate, in case such matter is included, the custom is to submit the question of order to the Senate.

Then the manual cites a case where Vice President Hobart took that stand, and also where Mr. Lodge, as presiding officer at the time, ruled in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is familiar with the rule cited by the Senator. Of course, it is perfectly obvious that where neither House has a provision with reference to a matter, the conferees cannot insert anything with reference to it; but the House having struck out all the language of the Senate bill and included nothing upon the controverted points, the Senate conferees and the House conferees had the right to make such changes as might be germane to the language of the Senate bill that were not included in the House bill.

Mr. CAREY. I may misinterpret what I have read, but I believe it means that where there is a question as to whether there is new matter the question should be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled on the subject.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Chair will bear with me for a moment, I could not concede that when a bill has been handled as this one has, when all after the enacting clause has been stricken from the bill and new material has been added as the act of the House, that material is any different from any other amendment which might be added; and, in my opinion, it ought to be treated in exactly the same way. I do not see how greater latitude is given by that particular act.

We had this question to deal with no later than yesterday in connection with the free zone bill. The Senate had passed a bill providing for free zones, and the House had passed a bill with a different number. They did not take our bill. Then, in order that we might get the matter in conference, on my motion in the Senate we took the House bill, struck out all after the enacting clause, and inserted as an amendment our own bill. So we had before us in the conference everything that the Senate had discussed, everything the committee of the Senate had considered and the Senate had considered and had amended upon the floor, together with the bill as it passed the House. In other words, we had before us exactly the same sort of composite bill that we have here.

I cannot concede that any more latitude is given to conferees by reason of this peculiar act than there would be if we amended the bill in the ordinary way. We have before us now, and the conferees had before them, the Senate bill exactly as we passed it, and the House bill as they chose to rewrite it; so the language of the two Houses is here for consideration. My contention is, and I suppose ever will be, Mr. President, that the conference report has gone entirely aside from what was done either by the House or by the Senate, and, in my judgment, is a clear violation of the second clause of rule XXVII.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It seems to me, if I understand the ruling of the Chair, that the Senate is left in this amazing position with respect to conference reports:

The Chair rules that so long as the new matter is germane, it is eligible. It does not make any difference how revolutionary it may be, how far afield it may be from any consideration either in the House or in the Senate; so long as it is germane it is eligible.

Any legislation respecting air mail would be germane to an air mail bill. Therefore, it seems to me that the ruling of the Chair strikes down all boundaries in respect to conference reports, and in practical effect leaves the conferees absolutely unlimited in their dealings with legislation; and it seems to me that would be a most unfortunate precedent.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I know that the Chair has ruled in accordance with precedents; but I share the apprehension of the Senator from Michigan that this decision and this act of ours will come back to haunt us. There is always a temptation on the part of conferees to go into the entire subject, to take up some matters which no doubt are germane, but which, after all, change the spirit of the act.

In the Appropriations Committee of the Senate we are extremely careful to avoid placing in the appropriation bills anything which can be called legislation. While that may not be on all fours with what we have before us, yet, after all, the conference committee have undertaken to legislate for the Senate. They have written into the air mail bill matters which are not in either the House bill or the Senate bill. They have superseded the Senate—indeed, they have superseded the Congress—in the choice of language and in writing into the conference report matter which is entirely aside from anything that was agreed upon in the Senate and anything that was agreed upon in the House.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to appeal from the decision of the Chair. If some other Senator has, that is for him to decide. I think, however, that if we have not established today an unfortunate precedent, we have at least made indelible a precedent the beginning of which, perhaps, was found in the ruling of Vice President Curtis or of Vice President Hobart years ago.

I am sure that in the future we shall be embarrassed by what we do here today, and that in the future conferees will be free to act as they please in rewriting a bill and bringing here language which the House and the Senate never intended should be written into the bill. That is what we have done with this bill; but, so far as I am concerned, as I said in the beginning, as the temporary custodian of the rules of the Senate, I felt it my duty to call attention to the matter. I have done so. The Chair has ruled, and it is for the Senate to decide whether the ruling shall stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appreciates the position of the Senator; but in order that the RECORD may be complete, not for the purpose of argument at all, it may not be inappropriate to insert in the RECORD at this point the remarks of the late Senator Cummins of Iowa, who was the President pro tempore of the Senate at the time the point of order was made against the Muscle Shoals conference report, as to what is new matter:

What is "new matter"? It is quite impossible to define this phrase with that accuracy and precision which will make any rule announced applicable to the infinite variety of cases that will arise. It has seemed to the Chair that the words "new matter" as found in rule XXVII and "new legislation" as found in rule XVI must mean practically the same thing. The fact of the identity of these two phrases makes it all the more important that the ruling upon the points of order now before the Senate shall be correct. Without attempting to define "new matter", the Chair is of the opinion that it was intended when this paragraph of the rule was adopted to restrict the general parliamentary law as frequently announced by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The Chair does not desire to be understood as holding that every change made in the Senate bill by the conference report constitutes "new matter." It is of the opinion that in order to bring the change within the spirit of rule XXVII new matter must be of substantial import; that is to say, a change affecting in a substantial way the plan proposed in the Senate bill.

The Chair does not think his decision in this case violates that definition.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I thank the Presiding Officer for his patience and consideration. I insist, however, that if we were to go no further than page 2, paragraph (d) of the report, it would be perfectly clear that new matter had been inserted in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled. If the Senator desires to appeal, of course, he has that right.

Mr. COPELAND. I understand that, and the reason why I do not press the matter further is because I do not wish to appear to be in the position of obstructing the passage of the proposed legislation. I said in the beginning that in general it has my sympathy, and I would not wish to appear to be doing anything to obstruct the final action upon the bill. I did feel, however, and I still feel, that it is a mistake; that we ought not to receive this report in its present form, and that by doing so we are establishing a precedent which will be very distressing to us in the future.

Mr. VANDENBERG. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Without presuming to argue with the Chair, and seeking only to be sure that the ruling is clarified against any unintentional precedent, may I inquire of the Chair whether it is a literal reflection of his ruling that the only test binding conferees in the insertion of new matter in a conference report is that it shall be germane?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is basing that suggestion in the decision he rendered upon the language of former Vice President Curtis, who laid down that rule when he stated that when the language of one bill is entirely stricken out and new language is inserted the conferees have full latitude within the bounds of germaneness.

If the present occupant of the chair is mistaken about that, then the former Vice President was probably responsible.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I speak with the greatest respect for the Chair, and the Chair undoubtedly considers that he is within the precedents; but let me say that I consider it a very unfortunate precedent. I am not in charge of the bill or in charge of the point of order, so certainly I would not feel entitled to take an appeal; but I think it would be exceedingly hazardous and a step in the direction of legislation by conference instead of by Congress—and heaven knows we have had too much legislation by conference, even within the limits of the rules as heretofore known—that it would be almost a final and conclusive delivery of the ultimate jurisdiction over legislation to conferees, if the only test of new matter is the test of germaneness, because any legislation dealing with the subject and the text of the bill obviously would be germane. Therefore we sweep away all boundaries in respect to new matter as measures may go to conference.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have some concern over the breadth of the decision of the Presiding Officer as to the latitude of conferees in presenting reports. I would have very much more concern, however, if this branch of the Congress paid the same respect to the rules under which it operates that the other branch pays to its rules.

In this branch of the Congress we have gotten into the habit of making a decision today and reversing it tomorrow, until that has become so common that there is not a Senator in this body who does not recognize that a decision is made upon considerations of policy, and not based upon parliamentary rules. That it is common indeed is admitted by those who give instructions on the matter of rules.

I cited a case in point, but the Chair ruled against me, and would have been sustained if I had appealed from the decision of the Chair. Therefore, the present occupant of the chair did wisely, I think, in paying no further attention to it.

The same thing precisely applies to the matter of relevancy of debate. Each Senator is his own judge as to whether what he is saying is relevant to the matter before the Senate. The same thing is true with reference to germaneness. A matter is held germane if it contributes to putting over the matter in issue. That is the way we regard the rules of the Senate. The rules are not so regarded in another branch of the Congress, as every Member of this body who has had any service in the other branch will readily recognize.

Mr. President, I have little talent for pleading before a jury which has already made up its mind. Most of the interest one has in the final determination of a question is lessened to the zero point when he recognizes, before he says what he has in mind, that what he is saying will have no effect whatever.

I have very little talent for talking on points which have been discussed by others. The Senator from Vermont went over the conference report item by item, and pointed out the objectionable features. I think he covered pretty nearly in toto all that is involved in the report, with probably the exception of determining what the ultimate results will be.

Anyone who is and has been interested in building up the art of flying will readily recognize the difference between the proposed legislation and the McNary-Watres Act. The two are as widely different as policies are different. The McNary-Watres Act was put on the statute books primarily to build up the aviation industry. That was the major purpose of the act. It was the authority which was granted by Congress to carry into effect the recommendations of the Aircraft Board, which had been appointed, had made its study, and submitted its recommendations which were ultimately translated into law. Anyone who will study the Aircraft Board's report will recognize the emphasis that was placed upon the necessity of the United States being in the forefront in building this new arm. Whether it be from the point of view of military position, of commercial use, as an agency for fuller life in America, or to be used in the transmission of mails—from whatever point the recommendations is viewed, one must be impressed with the desire on the part of our Government not to lag behind, but to take the leadership in building up aviation and the art of flying.

For that reason there was extended as much aid as under the law could be granted to those who were willing to take the risk, invest their capital, and produce such results as were feasible.

The one very outstanding unit in the building of aviation was that which was engaged in research work. For that purpose a large amount of money was expended, all of which was risked, and on none of which could there be assurance of return; but it was expended in the hope of making aviation, which was an American invention, stand out as an American achievement above that of every other country.

It is a well-known fact, admitted by all who know, that in the beginning we did lag behind France because of the assistance given aviation by the French Government. After the Wright brothers had made it possible for the heavier-than-air craft to stay in the air, the French Government saw the importance of aviation, and for quite a while the United States was trailing France. After the war, however, and during the period when the world recognized the importance of this new activity—not only its possibilities in war but in commerce—because of the sympathetic aid of the Government the United States took the lead in aviation and kept it up to February 19 of this year.

The McNary-Watres Act, as stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], sought to give such Government aid to the development of the art of flying as not only to make aviation a method of transportation but also to make it a profitable industry, and one which would be of importance in the employment of labor. It was not long until, by this aid, the United States had the finest flying equipment of any country on the globe.

One of the foundations on which this industry was built was the promise to those who would take the risk in developing the industry that they might have some return on their investment. Consequently, when the Government suggested that those who carried the mail be requested also to enter into the passenger service, that was done primarily for the purpose of building an industry. It was justified. It was a new investment of American capital. It was a new opportunity for the employment of American labor. In addition, it was the building of equipment which would be a defense in time of great danger. It cannot be hoped to make an industry of this kind profitable unless some assurance can be given that there will be improvement in the art.

It was first suggested that a lone man could fly in a plane. That suggestion led to the discussion of increasing the sizes of planes. Now we see, by the aid of the Government which stood back of the aviator who was willing to take the risk, the development of aviation to the point where the modern plane has become a floating palace of the air. While we have not yet reached the point where safety is entirely assured, the cases of fatalities are rare in comparison with the number of miles flown every day.

What I have said, Mr. President, has been said to indicate the major purpose back of the McNary-Watres Act. I desire to emphasize as strongly as I can that when the Government entered into air-mail contracts, the service to the public in the delivery of mail was not the only purpose contemplated; but primarily it was an effort to insure the leadership of the world in aviation.

We finally reached that position. It was reached with difficulty. What was done under the direction of the Postmaster General to reach that position has come under criticism. He was criticized for what he did in the matter of the surrender of contracts let by competitive bidding and the issuance of route certificates in lieu of them, with complete power on the part of the Postmaster General to make the necessary regulations, so that not only would the mail be carried with facility and the public served but while that was being done the industry would also be built up. Consequently, when we had a crazy air map that linked almost every city with another city, a hodge-podge, with no system, with as many companies as there were distances between cities, no responsibility, no finances, no facilities for building up a unified industry, the Postmaster General took direction of this crazy air map, this hodge-podge, and by the authority written specifically as the result of recommendations made before the law was enacted, through bids, through route certificates, through extensions, in 4 years we developed the finest aviation map the world knows.

So far as the burden on the Government is concerned in paying for air-mail facilities, the rate which is the measure of that burden was cut from $1.29 to below 40 cents in 4 years; and with the progress which was being made under the authority of the existing law, beyond a doubt, with the increase of the revenue coming from a well-equipped industry, we would have reached the time in 3 or 4 years when there would not have been a dollar of subsidy paid to the service, when the industry would have been self-supporting, when the only thing for which the Government would have paid would have been actual service. All this could have been done without the change of an iota in the law which is now in existence.

It is a shameless boast that under the temporary contracts which have taken the place of the contracts which were canceled we are saving so many million dollars; it is pitiable that any responsible man would make such a statement as that, when, under the law now existing, as I have heretofore made plain, the Postmaster General has ample authority to reduce the rates for carrying the mail to any extent he may see fit.

Mr. President, there are 11 items upon which costs of the carrying of the mail are fixed. Those items make up the risks the carrier must undertake. They include night flying, terrain, fogs, the one-way radio and the two-way radio, and so on. They include the number of motors a plane shall have. For a load of 200 pounds the cost is so much; for a load of 2,000 pounds the cost is so much more; for a load of 200 pounds a plane with a single motor may be used, while for a load of 2,000 pounds a trimotored plane must be used. The cost of carrying the air mail being made up of these and other items, which are all under the control of the Postmaster General, by the authority of the law under which he is now operating, if today at the rate heretofore allowed such carriage is costing the Government $20,000,000, the Postmaster General may say, "We will cut the cost 50 percent and make it $10,000,000"; and the cost will be so much for night flying, so much taking the terrain and fogs into consideration, so much for one motor, so much for a trimotor, and so forth. There is no need of a single change of any existing law in order to authorize the Postmaster General to reduce the cost of carrying the air mail. And yet it was assumed that contracts must be canceled and that a new law must be passed in order to reduce the cost of the air mail to the Government.

Mark my words, Mr. President, there will be no reduced cost to the Government under this plan. The Government may cut the length of a route or the number of trips if that be desired to be done and in that way reduce the cost at the start, but the chairman of the committee knows, as every other Senator knows, that it will not be possible to deny the public the facilities of air mail which they once enjoyed if those facilities be justified. Where there has been the delivery of such mail twice or three times a day, if there shall be provided but one daily delivery, the very object for which the air mail is provided will be defeated. If but one trip is made in 24 hours, and the mail plane reaches its destination 5 minutes after the connecting plane which was to carry the mail forward has taken off, and there is not another mail plane leaving that point for 24 hours, every pound of mail that goes out of that point to any other city within a thousand miles is put on a train. If the city is only 600 miles away, the train will have covered the distance and be in the town of delivery before the plane would start the next day. Anybody who is fool enough to think that the American people are going to stand for any such service as that has no business in the United States Senate. The people will not stand for it. It may be inaugurated on the basis that money is going to be saved, but it is not going to be continued.

Mr. President, if the proposal, as is here intended, is to avoid altogether any interest being manifested in the development of aviation, if it be the purpose to take the support of the Government wholly away from the building up of aviation and to limit the activities of the Government only to interest in the delivery of mail, what will be the outcome of such a policy? The small plane will be used. Note the rates here—33 cents for the first 300 pounds. It makes no difference whether the plane starts off with 10 pounds, it is paid for 300 pounds; and then, if the 300-pound limit is exceeded, the rate is 3.3 cents for the next 100, and so on to a certain point until nothing is paid for the excess. So, under this plan, the greater the load the less will be paid, and it will be to the interest of the mail carrier not to increase the load, because the more he carries the less he will get. That is fine economy, is it not? Yet that is precisely what is written into this proposed law.

Mr. President, the main thing that I so much dislike is that the Government is entirely withdrawing from any interest whatever in aviation except for the carrying of the mail; there is to be no effort on the part of the Government to build up an industry which every other nation of the world is today developing by Government support.

We carried the mail up to February 19 of this year for one-half what it is carried for by any other country in the world, and if the procedure which was then being followed had been continued uninterruptedly, with the increase of passenger service, the revenue would have increased, the cost of carrying the mail would have correspondingly decreased, and we should have reached a point, in a very short time when there would have been no subsidy paid. All that, however, has gone out of this bill. It affords no impetus for increasing the size and the efficiency of airplanes. There is no such provision, except a discouraging one, that if the load is increased a point is reached above which the mail will be carried for nothing, which means that no company will reach the point where they will have to carry additional mail for nothing. It is such an unsound provision that there can be no doubt that in a year from now we will be paying more for carrying the air mail than we paid when the contracts were canceled. More than that, we will not build up an aviation industry in this country; and, more than that, the Government will never reach the point where we can get away from the payment of a subsidy.

My good friend from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is intense in his opposition to subsidies and always has been. I have not any quarrel with him on that score, though he and I differ on the particular subject. He is intensely opposed to subsidies, and yet he had to recognize that the element of subsidy could not be entirely eliminated here, and so the date is pushed forward to sometime in the future when the plan is to be discontinued. Of course it will not be discontinued because when we reach that date we will know more about it than we do at the present time.

Mr. President, I take the position that if we were alone and had nobody to be concerned about but our own people, then we could afford to do as we pleased about the question of power in the air. But with the world as it is, with nations as they are, with flying ability as it is being improved and extended in all the world, we cannot stand by with our Government wholly disinterested in the development of aviation. We must keep abreast; there must be no lagging. There is no item in the bill which would permit any appreciation of any new discovery or new invention. There is no inducement for the expenditure of any money to build or develop a better kind of airplane. In the last 4 years the most remarkable development has taken place, reaching its highest point in the famous Boeing plane and Douglas plane, which are now the wonder of all the world. That is only a suggestion of what we might do in the future if the Government itself does not break down the industry.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, that I very greatly deplore the vengeance written in the bill, which is aimed at certain practices—practices which are subject to condemnation—but which goes to the extent of not only not curing the practices but of denying to the industry the things which are essential to it. I refer to the provision which will not permit any company which has an air-mail contract to own anything in the way of aviation that is not directly connected with the carrying of mail. I have heretofore pointed out the danger of such a provision.

It may be that aviation has gone far enough today that sufficient capital can be put back of a single company to build up the art of flying with the support of the Government in air mail. It may be a company can be found which is strong enough financially not to have to depend upon any outside assistance for its finances. But I am desperately afraid that we have not reached that point.

Eighty percent of the operations of an airway are on the ground. The actual flying is but one-fifth of its activities. The groundwork that is regarded as essential in many cases includes not only the airports, but includes repair shops. It includes a unit for photographing and photography work, which has become very essential. It includes the ground school. In many cases it includes the development and building of airplanes. But here is a bill which inflicts a penalty upon any company if it owns anything except that which is identified with the carrying of the mail. I think it is unwise.

I believe I have never seen a better statement of the importance of giving a company which is flying a plane, even for the Government, the right to have these appointments on the ground, than was contained in a letter which the chairman of the committee received from one of the leading companies of America on the 20th of March of this year. One of the units of this leading company is Eastern Airways, flying from New York down the coast to Miami. The bill forbids anything like a holding company. I make a distinction, of course, between the holding company which is purely speculative and which ought to be eliminated, and the holding company which might be actually the operating company. From the letter I quote:

There should be a clear differentiation made between:

(1) The financial interest of large corporations in air-transport companies made for the purpose of developing the industry through adding to the management and financial resources of the operating company, with the hope of realizing ultimate operating profits—

That sort of an organization could not be subject to criticism. It is a part of the operation—and (2) the financial interests of investment corporations made in air transport companies for the purpose of stock speculation.

There is no real basis for such a company.

For example, North American Aviation's relation to its transport subsidiaries would be the same whether the transport subsidiaries were divisions of North American Aviation rather than separate corporations operating as subsidiaries of North American Aviation. For legal reasons which I feel need not be outlined to your committee, who for the major part have legal training, the advantages of a subsidiary company conducting its operations through many States are well known. It may be stated that these advantages are the same as those which cause many large corporations to incorporate separate operating subsidiaries in several States. For this reason I should like to differentiate between North American Aviation and a true holding company, which I feel falls within the second classification mentioned.

In other words, North American Aviation is the parent company of its transport subsidiaries and is not a holding company in the true sense.

Mr. President, there is the differentiation which I desire to emphasize. Any holding company which is organized merely for stock speculation ought to be eliminated; but if the holding company is operating a subsidiary, and becomes a part-operating company supplying the finances, it ought not to be penalized.

The writer of this letter says:

It is my firm opinion that companies created for the purpose of making investments for speculative purposes in numerous aviation companies, especially when companies in which the investments are made are fully competitive, are a drawback rather than a help to the aviation business. In many instances this latter type of true holding company insists on representation on the boards of directors of competitive companies.

That, of course, would also be subject to criticism.

In being associated with North American Aviation as the parent company, our transport companies have the comfortable feeling that there are ample financial resources back of them to carry them through lean periods of reasonable length, as witnessed by the fact that in spite of the losses of the transport subsidiaries during the past 2 years, the parent company is sufficiently financed to advance funds to purchase new equipment in order to keep up the standard of operations competitively. Furthermore, the relations of our parent company with its strong, ably financed stockholders of recognized business ability make available to our operating companies the results of the research and development work of such strong business associates.

Here is one of the strongest statements I have yet seen on behalf of the need of a successful company carrying the mail to have the opportunity of enlarging its facilities through the ownership or relationship of subsidiaries. This statement was made in a letter to the chairman of the committee:

During the past year there were three important developments of transport airplanes in this country.

The question is, Who brought about these developments? It strikes me that a prohibition written into the law which forbids any company to have any association with any other company which may be supplying some facilities which the company flying the mail must have is a very grave mistake when we are trying to build up the aviation industry.

I do not care to take the time of the Senate to read all of the letter to the chairman of the committee. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

NORTH AMERICAN AVIATION, INC.,
New York City, March 20, 1934.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Chairman Post Offices and Post Roads Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. MCKELLAR: The first paragraph of section 7 of Senate bill 3012 reads as follows:

"No person shall be eligible to bid on, or hold, any air-mail contract who owns, or, in turn, is owned, in whole or in part, by any other company engaged directly or indirectly in any phase of the aviation industry, whether the other company be a holding company or a company transporting mail or holding a mail contract or a company engaged in the manufacture or sale of airplanes, airplane parts, or other materials or accessories generally used in air transportation."

It is my opinion that your committee should be informed of the true conditions with respect to the relations of holding companies and manufacturing companies with transport companies, in order that an intelligent decision may be reached as to whether any legislation should be passed dealing with such relations.

There should be a clear differentiation made between:

First. The financial interest of large corporations in air transport companies made for the purpose of developing the industry through adding to the management and financial resources of the operating company, with the hope of realizing ultimate operating profits; and Second. The financial interests of investment corporations made in air transport companies for the purpose of stock speculation.

For example, North American Aviation's relation to its transport subsidiaries would be the same whether the transport subsidiaries were divisions of North American Aviation rather than separate corporations operating as subsidiaries of North American Aviation, Inc.

For legal reasons which I feel need not be outlined to the members of your committee, who for the major part have legal training, the advantages of a subsidiary company conducting its operations through many States are well known. It may be stated that these advantages are the same as those which cause many large corporations to incorporate separate operating subsidiaries in several States. For this reason I should like to differentiate between North American Aviation, Inc., and a true holding company, which I feel falls within the second classification mentioned above.

In other words, North American Aviation is the parent company of its transport subsidiaries and is not a holding company in the true sense.

It is my firm opinion that companies created for the purpose of making investments for speculative purposes in numerous aviation companies, especially when companies in which the investments are made are fully competitive, are a drawback rather than a help to the aviation business. In many instances this latter type of true holding company insists on representation on the boards of directors of competitive companies. The progress of this industry, like all other businesses, depends upon competition to a great extent for its technical developments. With interlocking directorates of competitive companies brought about through this latter type of true holding company, the plans of the operating company are made known to competitors, thereby destroying initiative in the operating companies. This evil is not existent in the parent company set-up, such as the relations of North American Aviation and its transport subsidiaries today.

The Post Office administration has stressed the point that air transport companies operating transcontinentally must be competitive and that interlocking directorates and intercompany ownership of stocks in such competitive operations must be eliminated. I am heartily in accord with that principle. This does not mean, however, that a large corporation amply financed and well managed should not have an interest in more than one operating company when such companies are not competitive.

Dealing further with the parent company set-up, as distinguished from true holding companies, I should like to point out the following advantages of the operating company's being associated with such a parent company.

I. FINANCIAL STRENGTH

In being associated with North American Aviation as the parent company, our transport companies have the comfortable feeling that there are ample financial resources back of them to carry them through lean periods of reasonable length, as witnessed by the fact that in spite of the losses of the transport subsidiaries during the past 2 years the parent company is sufficiently financed to advance funds to purchase new equipment in order to keep up the standard of operations competitively. Furthermore, the relations of our parent company with its strong, ably financed stockholders of recognized business ability make available to our operating companies the results of the research and development work of such strong business associates. It is a well-known fact that the largest stockholder in our parent company spends tremendous sums in research and development with respect to aviation, despite the fact that tremendous development losses have been incurred by such stockholder in aviation projects. Were Eastern Air Transport, for example, solely on its own, it assuredly could not finance the vast research, engineering, and development work which this industry must have in order to make progress and stay ahead of developments in foreign countries. Therefore, I should like to emphasize that it is a comfortable feeling to know that these subsidiaries may have at their disposal the financial resources of the parent company for the further development of flying equipment and instruments in the years to come.

Another point in connection with financial strength is the fact that it would be practically impossible for Eastern Air Transport to continue in business at the present moment were it not for funds which will be advanced by its parent company, North American Aviation, Inc. It is a well-known fact that industries which are admittedly more stable and which can show a greater possibility of earnings than the air-transport industry are unable to raise funds at this time to replace capital depleted through losses. To legislate at this time that each transport company must be set up on its own without having any parent company to call upon for its extraordinary financial requirements as emergencies may arise would certainly make this industry subject to all the evils of stock-market speculation.

II. DEVELOPMENT OF FLYING EQUIPMENT

During the past year there were three important developments of transport airplanes in this country. Who brought out these developments? The Curtiss Condor, the first development, was developed for Eastern Air Transport by the Curtiss-Wright Corporation, which at that time was indirectly affiliated with E.A.T. The Boeing 247, in general use over United Air Lines, was developed by United Aircraft & Transport Corporation. The T.W.A. luxury liner was built by the Douglas Co., which was indirectly affiliated with Transcontinental & Western Air.

What developments contributing to the advance of the aviation industry were brought out by the independent air lines which had no affiliation, direct or indirect, with manufacturing companies? Absolutely none. The outstanding developments in instruments contributing to the safety of air transport have been made by the Sperry Gyroscope Co. At the time these developments were made, the Sperry Gyroscope Co. was directly affiliated with Eastern Air Transport, both of these companies being owned by North American Aviation, Inc.

It is no accident that the above is true. These developments have been brought out by transport companies affiliated with manufacturing companies, and none brought out by air transport companies not affiliated with manufacturing companies for one reason, namely, it takes millions of dollars and complete cooperation in the exchange of technical knowledge and practical experience between the operator and the manufacturer to carry out the experimental and development work. It is a well-known fact that the first T.W.A.-Douglas luxury liner cost substantially in excess of $300,000, while T.W.A. paid less than one-half of this development cost. Unless the manufacturing company has a financial interest in the transport company, which the manufacturing company desires to enhance in value through its contributions to the transport company, certainly there will be no reason for the manufacturing company to incur losses in the development of planes and instruments for air transport companies, and the latter will have to pay the full cost of such developments.

III. CONTINUITY OF MANAGEMENT

It is a well-known fact that many companies, not only in the air-transport business but in other industries, changed hands after the 1929 stock-market crash. This is generally the case where a sufficient interest in an operating company is not held by a strong group. I know that in our own case, until a large interest in our parent company was secured by one of the strongest industrial groups in this country, it was difficult for the management and employees of Eastern Air Transport and other transport subsidiaries to know from day to day for whom they were working. Continuity of management cannot be insured in any operating company unless there is at least sufficient stock concentration for the purpose of developing the business as a permanently profitable operation rather than as a stock-market speculation; otherwise the management and employees are subject to the will of the speculating public from day to day.

IV. SAVINGS BY COMBINED PURCHASES

There is one great advantage to being associated with a parent company which also has other interests which are noncompetitive with the transport company's interests. Our transport subsidiaries have been given the advantages of purchase contracts of one of the largest corporations in the United States, due to the parent company association. In addition, there has been recently made available to all of our employees, including pilots, group insurance available to the parent company at the lowest rates in effect for any class of employees in any industry in this country. To be specific, our pilots at this time enjoy a $5,000 group-insurance policy for the very low rate of 60 cents per month per $1,000 of insurance. This is the same rate of insurance that is offered to a stenographer or a clerk.

Due to the interests of our parent company in Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc., which is noncompetitive with Eastern Air Transport, the development of the finest transport ship ever developed in this country or abroad to date, will be made available to Eastern Air Transport. Eastern Air Transport by itself could never afford to spend the money to bring about this development. Further, as stated above, Eastern Air Transport, like other small operators, could not finance the purchase of such equipment.

V. MANAGEMENT

Due to the association with a parent company which has as its principal stockholder one of the largest and most able management groups in this country, all of this managerial ability is available to the transport subsidiaries without cost. This far-seeing group has already contributed and is continuing to contribute management and research services to our companies which we could never hope to obtain if we had to pay for them.

There has never been one cent assessed against Eastern Air Transport or Transcontinental & Western Air for these services. Further, neither of these companies has ever paid 1 cent in cash dividends to the parent company.

VI. PUBLIC CONFIDENCE

The success of the air transport business depends upon public confidence in the operating company. The universal knowledge that a transport company is backed up by the financial and management resources of a recognized successful industrial organization is a tremendous asset.

VII. ECONOMIES OF ADMINISTRATION

I do not think that there need be detailed the advantages of being able to distribute fixed administrative costs over the combined operations of our transport subsidiaries, as against each transport subsidiary having its own complete administrative and supervisory expenses. In other words, through having Eastern Air Transport and Transcontinental & Western Air and Western Air Express affiliated, these airlines are able to coordinate their supervisory activities in such a manner as to materially reduce administrative expenses. Through the appointment of Mr. Eastman as Coordinator of Railroads, there has been the recognition of this principle, looking toward eliminating uneconomic set-ups by bringing about more practicable combinations. Why should the same mistake be made in the air transport business that was made by the railroads in the past, namely, breaking up the air transport companies into small uneconomic units?

RECOMMENDATIONS

It is recommended that a Federal regulatory board be set up to issue certificates of necessity and convenience to all airlines operating on February 19, 1934; and further, that this Federal regulatory board be empowered:

(1) To prevent interlocking directorates of competitive companies; and

(2) To prevent an air transport company purchasing airplanes, airplane parts, or other material, from affiliated companies or subsidiaries, at a price in excess of the lowest prices at which such equipment has been sold or offered for sale to nonaffiliated interests.

Respectfully yours,

E. R. BREECH,
Chairman of the Board.

(Same letter sent to Hon. JAMES M. MEAD, Chairman House Post Office and Post Roads Committee, with reference, H.R. 8578.)

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, there is another feature about the conference report which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] overlooked.

I have spoken of the tendency of this bill to limit operation to the small plane. Naturally, it will be stated that it was not intended to do that; that all it was intended to do was to open the way for the small plane, the single-motor plane, not to shut it out. I recognize that that is feasible, provided when we open the way for the small plane to operate on a short route we do not make the law so rigid that the small plane never can become a large plane; that the route flown by this immature company which would like to have some work to do shall not be bound down by the rigidity of the law so that it will always remain short.

Another thing that I do not like is that it is not in keeping with our best interests to open the bidding to everybody, whether qualified or not. All of us know how, in former years, some speculators who saw an opportunity of cleaning up undertook to get money together and then asked for a Government contract even before they had purchased any planes and agreed upon an executory contract to be executed after a Government contract had been secured.

What is the meaning of section 5 of this conference report? It provides that—

> After the bids are opened, the Postmaster General may grant to a successful bidder a period of not more than 30 days from the date of award of the contract to take the steps necessary to qualify for mail services under the terms of this act.

Mr. President, here is a company which is not qualified. It may not have the necessary financial assets; it may not have a single plane; it may have no equipment whatever. A few men get together, however. They say, "We can buy some planes; we can float our stock"; and they can announce that they have a contract with the Government and offer their stock for sale, and if in 30 days they shall have purchased their planes and qualified, the contract will be permitted.

That is the sort of thing that was refused in the preceding administration, and it ought to be refused.

Mr. President, I am willing now to make the statement that before this year is over there will be a demand either for a repeal of this law or for a revision of it. The facts are that we shall not succeed, financially or otherwise, under this procedure. The mail routes will be open to everybody; and when the time comes that the people realize what they are in for, there will be, without doubt, a terrific revulsion demanding a change.

To me this is the most curious performance that the Senate has been called upon to undertake.

Section 20 of the conference report provides for the creation of a commission, and the duties of the commission are specified.

Section 21 provides for the organization and equipment of the commission.

The commission is directed in section 20 to study the aviation problem and to make its recommendations to Congress of such legislation as its findings justify.

If the bill had provided that a commission should be appointed to report by February 1, 1935, as this commission is required to do, leaving the present temporary contracts to be supplanted by the definite, permanent law to be recommended by the commission appointed for the purpose, it would be entirely logical. I have never before known a case, however, where permanent law was enacted, and in the same law a commission was appointed to recommend what the permanent law should be.

Look at our situation. All the contracts have been canceled, and it is proposed to substitute for them temporary contracts. The temporary contracts are for 3 months. There is a provision in the temporary law to permit them to continue for 9 months, making a year all told; or we could, if necessary, have extended them by joint resolution. These temporary contracts have been let. They should be continued until the commission shall have had time to study and report what should be the permanent law to take the place of the temporary law. Instead of that, we propose to appoint a commission at the same time that we displace the temporary contract, and enact permanent law as we appoint the commission.

There never has been, to my knowledge, anything which duplicates such a proposal as that.

I can understand why this temporary plan is desired to be put in the form of a permanent plan. That was made very clear by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN].

Under the temporary plan, contracts already have been let. Let me put in the RECORD some of these contracts:

American Airlines, Boston to New York, 33⅓ cents a mile.

American Airlines, Fort Worth to Los Angeles, 39½ cents.

American Airlines, New York to Buffalo, on to Chicago, 39½ cents.

American Airlines, New York to Fort Worth, 13 cents.

American Airlines, Chicago to Fort Worth, 8 cents.

American Airlines, Washington to Chicago, 29 cents.

American Airlines, Cleveland to Nashville, 48¾ cents.

American Airlines, Boston to Cleveland, 24 cents.

There are two or three very singular deductions to be made. The first is that the American Airlines has a contract for carrying the mail from Fort Worth to Los Angeles at 39½ cents a mile. It also has a contract for carrying the mails from New York to Fort Worth for 13 cents a mile. Is that a transcontinental line? One contract is to carry the mail from New York to Fort Worth, another to carry the mail from Fort Worth to Los Angeles.

If the two routes are parts of a whole, then there is a line from coast to coast, from New York to Los Angeles, by way of Fort Worth; but the singular fact is that the rate from New York to Fort Worth is 13 cents a mile, while the rate from Fort Worth to Los Angeles is 39½ cents a mile. If it is counted as a single transcontinental route, then there is another transcontinental route that is operated by the Transcontinental & Western, from New York to Los Angeles, drawing 24 cents a mile for carrying the mail.

Here are two routes, one direct from New York to Los Angeles, another somewhat indirect, from New York to Fort Worth on to Los Angeles. The Transcontinental & Western gets 24 cents a mile, while the American Airlines, from New York to Fort Worth, gets 13 cents, and from Fort Worth to Los Angeles, 39½ cents. What is the basis of letting that contract?

Here is another indication of difficulty. One line, the United Airways, has a contract for carrying the mail from New York to San Francisco for 38 cents a mile. That is a transcontinental line. The United also has a contract for carrying the mail from Seattle to San Diego for 39½ cents. It has another contract for carrying the mail from Salt Lake to Seattle. According to the proposed permanent law, a company can own only one transcontinental line. It can own three additional lines if they are short. But here are primary lines, and the proposed law provides that a company may own but one primary line. Yet the United has a contract for two primary lines, one a transcontinental and the other the Western Shore. Those contracts were let as temporary. They are now in existence. This proposed permanent law violates a contract that was let. If this measure should go into effect, necessarily that line would have to give up one or the other, and the American Air Lines, which already has three contracts, is the low bidder on eight. Yet this proposed law requires that the contract be given to the low bidder. Here is a company which is the low bidder on eight contracts.

Mr. President, I make this statement, that before the year is out and the operation of this new proposal becomes a reality, it will either be repealed or so radically changed that it will not be able to identify itself.

Mr. President, as I stated at the outset, there is no great interest in discussing problems when one knows that the mind of the voter is already made up. There is not a bit of doubt in my mind that the word has gone out that this bill must not be sent back to conference. Not only that, but there is no doubt that, in the face of all the unfortunate background of recent times, this bill will become the law.

I simply satisfy myself by stating that I think it is exceedingly unfortunate. Here is the drama of vengeance; there is tragedy in every line of it; I deplore it exceedingly.

Mr. President, in the North American Review for this month the subject of the air mail was discussed by William E. Berchtold, and in his article he suggests a sound and permanent air policy. I had intended to comment on this article, but I shall not take the time to do so. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

THE AIR-MAIL AFFAIR—A CRITICAL APPRAISAL OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S RECENT BLUNDER, WITH SUGGESTIONS FOR THE FORMULATION OF A SOUND AND PERMANENT AIR POLICY

By William E. Berchtold

Surgeons would hardly recommend decapitation for a patient afflicted with what appeared to be a rash on the neck. But things are done differently in political clinics. The new deal consequently finds itself faced with the rather serious task of reviving an infant industry which was summarily beheaded because an incompleted political diagnosis indicated that some kind of treatment was needed.

The Black air-mail fiasco, incidentally, dealt the Roosevelt administration the first serious blow to its prestige. The White House is quick to point out that the Postmaster General and not the President canceled all air-mail contracts and that directions for the Army Air Corps to carry the mails were issued only after assurances were given that the job could be done. The General Staff of the Army says that it gave no such assurances and was not consulted. The Postmaster General testifies that he did not prepare the letter which he signed presenting to Congress his reasons for canceling the contracts. The Attorney General only advised the President on the point of law giving the Government power to cancel if fraud and collusion could be proved. The age-old game of buck-passing is usually a sure sign that a bad administrative blunder has been made.

One-third of the Senate Members and all of the House of Representatives must seek reelection in November. Although it is doubtful that the Republicans can whip the Black fiasco into anything like a major campaign issue, the President's adversaries are not likely to let him forget the incident during their fall campaigns.

The row in Congress and the administrative buck-passing have made a political football out of a problem of public policy which should have its basis in economics. The makeshift legislation which has been hastily formulated threatens to stifle development in air transportation for at least 3 years, if it does not wipe out much of the progress already made. The new bills, written under directions from the executive departments and not on the basis of experience gained by the congressional committees which consider them, have been labeled as "emergency" legislation. The emergency, resulting purely from an administrative blunder which could have been avoided, has been used to give consideration to provisions which would not be tolerated in a bill accorded customary deliberation. It is likely that if these provisions are permitted to stand, the Air Mail Service will face another investigation a few years hence which will make the so-called "Black scandals" look like a pink tea party.

Return of the old contracts to the operators would not be conducive to a fulfillment of the administration's apparent desire for a reshuffling of the contracts. It is this ardent desire for a redistribution of the air-mail routes, on the basis of a new set of rules, which has made observers apprehensive of the future of the Air Mail Service. It opens the way for political favoritism, stock-promotion schemes, and other shady acts on a scale which may wreck the efficiency of the Air Mail Service.

II

The administration's legislation would give successful bidders for new air-mail contracts 6 months in which to prepare to qualify for carrying the mail under terms of the contract. This might enable an alert promoter, without any experience in airline operation and without knowledge of operating costs, to bid against responsible companies which have spent millions of dollars in developing their routes. If such a bid were successful, the promoter could sell his stock to the public and, during the 6 months allowed him to prepare for operations, assemble the necessary personnel and equipment. It is more than likely that he would make an offer at junk prices for the fleet of airliners used by the company which failed to get the contracts, safe in the knowledge that the unsuccessful bidder must go out of business without revenue from air mail.

The emergency legislation provides for the awarding of contracts for a period of only 3 years, 6 months before the termination of which the Interstate Commerce Commission is to pass on the question of the public convenience and necessity of such routes. It is also authorized to fix fair rates for the carrying of air mail. Unless this provision is modified, it is safe to say that further development and research on new airliners which should provide faster and safer service at lower costs will be held in abeyance for 3 years.

Rapid obsolescence of equipment in new industries makes long-term contracts imperative. The 200 new high-speed airliners placed on the air lines of the United States during the last year to provide service at from 150 to 180 miles an hour were planned in 1931 and 1932. One company alone, among those whose contracts were canceled, had $3,500,000 worth of new equipment on order for delivery in the next 6 months. It is not possible to lay such plans on the basis of contracts running for such a short period as 3 years. It was this problem which Congress had in mind when Postmaster General Brown was authorized to grant route certificates for 10 years. Private companies carrying air mail in Europe have been granted exclusive contracts for from 10 to 25 years to insure the full benefits of long-term planning. This provision limiting contracts to 3 years is not consistent with the policies of the Roosevelt administration in other fields of legislation, where industrial planning has been given primary consideration. It is certain to play havoc in the air transport field, for there is no assurance that succeeding administrations which may choose to use the air mail as a political football will not call for another reshuffling of routes.

The aviation industry can hardly share President Roosevelt's enthusiasm for the Interstate Commerce Commission as the body which will regulate air transport and fix routes and rates at the end of the 3 years. Most leaders in the industry agree that the air transportation industry should be placed in the hands of a nonpolitical body whose members are appointed for long terms, but thoughts of the Interstate Commerce Commission leave them cold. It need only be recalled that that Commission's 15 years of effort, during which millions of dollars were spent to ascertain a fair value for the railroads, have been reduced to waste paper by the falling prices of the depression. It is not difficult to understand why a new industry, which has grown steadily during a depression, should not want to become enmeshed in regulations founded on outmoded railroad practice. The more logical suggestion would be the setting up of a new commission to handle air transport, thereby taking it out of political control without fastening the millstone of senile railroad philosophy around its neck.

It is likewise doubtful whether the elaborate provisions of the new legislation providing for the unscrambling of the present corporate structures of the major aviation companies will attain its ends without severely injuring the efficiency of the service. Not only would holders of air-mail contracts be forbidden to have associations with holding companies or manufacturers of aircraft and accessories, but any successful bidder on one of the three primary transcontinental routes would be prohibited from bidding on any secondary route. This would mean the operation of the air-mail system by a score or more of unrelated companies which could not possibly have the advantages of expert supervision, research, and traffic promotion which a few well-organized units could afford. The outcome of this provision is likely to make necessary the payment of subsidies to air lines for the next 10 years instead of the period of 3 to 5 years which seems the reasonable limit necessary on the basis of the experience of the present large operating units.

The tendency in American corporate structure has been toward a few large well-organized companies. The Interstate Commerce Commission has recognized the value of such organization in forcing the consolidation of the railroads into a few major systems, yet the provisions of the emergency air-mail legislation are in direct antithesis to that recognized trend. While certain evils are made possible through the interrelation of air lines with the aircraft and equipment companies which supply them, the importance of these evils has been emphasized out of all proportion to the facts. The air lines have not been loaded with inefficient equipment by their manufacturing affiliates. If such had been the case, the air transport system of the United States would not hold its position of world leadership. This subject of corporate structures is one which needs deeper study than the hasty consideration of emergency legislation can afford it.

The provisions prohibiting the sale or transfer of any air-mail contract to another company through a merger or consolidation are likewise apt to prove prejudicial to the public interest in maintaining the best service possible. Such a clause lacks the flexibility needed for administration of an efficient service, although it probably was included to keep to a minimum the promotion schemes of bidders whose only interest might be to sell their contracts.

Competitive bidding has been stressed as a primary requirement in the new deal for the air mail. It is an instrument of great value, but it can be used with disastrous results under certain conditions. Its importance has been overestimated in connection with the discussion of air-mail-contract awards, because the Postmaster General has power to lower rates when he may see fit to do so. Consequently, if the offer of the highest bidder were accepted, it might be lowered to a rate below that of the lowest bid within a year or two after the contract had been written. The new legislation would fix the maximum rate per airplane-mile at 40 cents, which is 2 cents higher than the average rate paid in 1933 and about 5 cents higher than the average rate being paid at the time the contracts were canceled.

Perhaps the most inconsistent feature of the emergency legislation is that it retains the old formula for purchasing space in air-mail planes and paying for it on a mileage basis, regardless of the amount of mail carried. This method of payment was one of the principal points in the McNary-Watres Act to draw the fire of the Black committee during its investigation. The proposal to place the payment on a basis of 2 mills per pound-mile, which is the amount actually collected by the Government from stamps, would be more consistent. Subsidy payments up to 25 cents a mile could be made in addition on routes which are not self-sustaining. This would place the much-discussed "subsidy" on the frank basis originally suggested by the President for ocean mail, instead of burying it in the contract payments. Representative JAMES M. MEAD and Representative CLYDE KELLY of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads made elaborate studies on this subject long before the Black committee heard its first witness, but apparently economics have been overthrown for political expediency.

If the emergency legislation does nothing else, it will remove one important objection to the old air-mail economics when the rate is reduced from 8 cents per ounce to 5 cents and the absurd charge of 13 cents for additional ounces is eliminated. No merchant would require a customer to pay 8 cents for his first loaf of bread and 13 cents for any additional loaves he might require, yet that is exactly what the Government has been doing with its air-mail rates for years. The new 5-cent rate should double the usefulness of the air mail to the public within a year after the rate goes into effect. If postcards could be carried for 2 cents, as a possible later revision of this section, another important step would be taken in placing the Air Mail Service on a sound economic basis.

The former holders of air-mail contracts might justly inquire why they should be required to bid at all for the new contracts which the emergency legislation directs shall be offered. Thirty-one of the 34 contracts canceled were awarded in 1925 to 1927 under competitive bidding in which there were from 3 to 9 bidders for each contract. The other three contracts were awarded in 1930 by Postmaster General Brown to the lowest responsible bidder. Anyone who will take the time to check the facts presented under oath by former Postmaster General Brown and other witnesses of the Black committee concerning Mr. Farley's charges of fraud and collusion will agree with Representative CLYDE KELLY, the father of the air mail: "I am compelled to say that evidence of fraud and collusion is not given (in Mr. Farley's letter). There is no showing to warrant such a drastic and arbitrary act as the cancelation of all contracts without a hearing. There was no justification for destroying all contracts without regard for the obligations which those contracts involved, not only for the contractors but for the Post Office Department."

The Roosevelt-Farley emergency air-mail legislation takes care of this point in a way which is, to say the least, unique. No company can bid on the new contracts advertised if "it or its predecessor is asserting or has any claim against the United States because of a prior annulment of any contract by the Postmaster General." In other words, the harassed operator must pay the penalty of waiving any just claim to damages which he may have as a result of the hasty cancelation, in order to have an opportunity to bid against competitors for the very routes which he has pioneered at the expense of millions of dollars and years of effort.

This practically bars the only avenue open to obtain redress of grievances. The lines found that they could not halt the cancelation action through injunction and that their only possible recourse would be through suits for damages in the United States Court of Claims. It is safe to say that by the time it should be possible to test the Government's grounds of fraud and collusion and obtain an opinion all of the companies would be bankrupt and out of business. The usual provision in the emergency legislation would make this bankruptcy doubly certain.

III

The cost of operating the domestic air-transport system at the present time is about $25,000,000 annually. Revenues from passengers and express amount to $10,000,000. It is obvious, therefore, that the lines must obtain revenue from air mail if they are to continue in operation. This would amount to $14,000,000 for the current year, which would leave a deficit of about $1,000,000 for the operators to meet. The best estimates made by the House Committee on Post Office and Post Roads place the income to the Government from stamps on air mail at $9,000,000, which leaves a payment of $5,000,000 as a subsidy.

It is this subsidy which much of the shouting was about during the Black investigation. It looks like small change at a time when the Government is spending hundreds of millions of dollars in enterprises which are no more than subsidies to agriculture, to railroads, to steamship lines, and to industry. It is no wonder then that many who have taken the time to probe into the economics of our air-mail policy suspect that there must be a political rat at the bottom of the Black investigation to produce such unsavory odors.

Senator BLACK had long been a critic of the air mail under Republican administrations, but his criticism was generally appraised as nothing more than the tactics of an avowed adversary of anything not done by the Democrats. While his call for an investigation of the air-mail system seemed superfluous just after Representative JAMES M. MEAD (also a Democrat and one of the few real students of air-mail policy in Congress) had completed an extraordinarily elaborate study with full recommendations for new legislation, the Senator from Alabama was not to be denied his inning after 12 years of Republican domination of the National Government.

Whether Postmaster General Farley referred to the Senator as a "publicity hound", as former Postmaster General Brown testified under oath and Farley later denied, is a question best suited to press-club-dinner satire. At any rate the Senator did not have to search widely for persons willing to pour stories of real or fancied intrigue against the public interest into his receptive ear. Even if he had been lacking in the slightest signs of a publicity complex, the stories told him were, no doubt, sufficient to cause any ambitious statesman ugly nightmares which only a senatorial investigation could dissolve.

Postmaster General Brown, who was also Mr. Hoover's campaign manager, had worked up a wide reputation as an air-mail tsar. While the results which he attained furnished the United States with an air transport system second to none, his methods were sometimes arbitrary and autocratic. Autocrats may achieve remarkable results wholly within the public interest but they make a host of enemies. His enemies were not only among the unsuccessful applicants for air-mail contracts but among some of the lines now referred to as the "favored contractors." Because air transport is a new industry and the competitive spirit has been equal to that of the railroads in the early days of the Hills and Harrimans, some of the favored contractors have not been above sniping at some of the other favored contractors. By most people who had seen this competitive spirit in its most heated form the possibilities of collusion would be appraised as a physical impossibility. The industry can charge part of its troubles to the petty jealousies of its representatives in Washington.

Senator BLACK could not complain about the size of the headlines given his investigation in the press, for he built up a weird story of stock-market gambling, missing and destroyed public files, secret conferences, and other questionable acts involving officials of some air lines and the Hoover Postmaster General. The ill-advised antics of William P. MacCracken, former Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Aeronautics, in refusing permission to investigators seeking to examine his files (on point of attorney's privilege), and later condoning the withdrawal of some papers from his file, brought the Black investigation to a sensational climax long before it had been completed.

Postmaster General Farley, already the butt of criticism of Democratic Congressmen dissatisfied with his patronage policies, was in danger of attacks from disgruntled party politicians for negligence of his duties in failing to act on the air-mail revelations. Solicitor Karl A. Crowley, formerly Washington lobbyist for one of the unsuccessful air-mail-contract applicants, examined the Black evidence and reported grounds of fraud and collusion warranting the cancelation of all air-mail contracts. The Attorney General confirmed the authority of the Postmaster General to make such a wholesale cancelation if grounds of fraud and collusion could be proved. Postmaster General Farley moved quickly to cancel all contracts after a White House conference.

Postmaster General Brown had not yet been called, although he made repeated requests to be permitted to appear before the committee to defend the charges made against him. Neither had some of the air-line operators holding contracts been called to testify, although officers of certain companies had been singled out for questioning. Testimony which might have been considered necessary in an impartial investigation was far from completed.

Unfortunately, the events which followed cancelation of the contracts were dominated by bitter political partisanship and public hysteria, the latter aroused by the tragic deaths of young Army fliers who were ordered to carry the mails without adequate training and equipment.

From the character of debate on the floors of Congress and editorial comment in the press it was difficult, at times, to believe that so prosaic a subject as public policy on the transportation of the mails was at the root of discussion. A woman Representative's demand that the administration halt the legalized murder of young Army fliers was met by a Member from the opposite side of the House brandishing a newspaper with the announcement that eight persons had just met death in a commercial air liner. The whole affair evolved itself into a kind of game so that anyone, without any study of the facts behind the case, might ask: "Whom are you for, Lindbergh or Roosevelt?" and proceed to tell whom he was backing.

The testimony before the Black committee runs into thousands of pages. Printing of the testimony fell so hopelessly behind that not even Members of Congress, outside the members of the Black committee, could examine the evidence pertinent to the cancelation at the time of the Postmaster General's action. The Members of Congress, along with Will Rogers and the general public, knew only what they read in the newspapers. Interested citizens might subscribe to a transcript of the testimony from a court stenographer in Washington, but such a subscription ran into hundreds of dollars of expense to those sufficiently concerned to obtain the material in this way.

Although the Black investigation made sensational front-page headlines (some of the most flagrant charges later being disproved in less conspicuous stories printed inside), there was not a major line of evidence introduced which would contribute substantially to final development of public policy on air mail. The testimony did document elaborately the fact that fortunes had been made during the golden era and that salaries and bonuses of some executives were beyond all justification.

It was surely not news that men who were lucky enough to invest in the bull market of 1927 to 1929 made huge fortunes in stock speculation. The implication made by Senator BLACK was that these fortunes in the speculative bull market were the result of exploitation of the air-mail contracts awarded certain companies. Aviation stocks were popular in the speculative market boom out of all proportion to current or future earnings, but this was not common to aviation stocks alone. Few insurance companies or pension funds, upon which widows and orphans might be expected to depend, invested in aviation stock in 1929, but they did invest in railroad and public-utility stocks. While the value of common stock in United Aircraft & Transport Corporation, the biggest of the aviation groups, was depreciating $200,000,000 from its highest peak in 1929 to its price before the air-mail contract cancelation, New York Central (a favorite railroad issue) showed a market value depreciation of more than $1,000,000,000.

The air lines certainly did not earn huge profits on the air-mail contracts. Few of the lines were able to break even or show small profits last year during the best 12 months in their history, while most of the lines have shown heavy losses since their inception. The new high-speed equipment, developed at tremendous cost for research, shows the first signs of sufficiently low operating costs to insure profits. Passenger and express revenues have been increasing at a rate which should make all operations profitable, even without the aid of a mail subsidy, within 3 to 5 years.

The McNary-Watres Act, which drew the heaviest fire from the Black committee, was not passed with the idea of providing the Government air-mail service at the cheapest price possible. It was deliberately designed to build up an air transport system of financially sound and experienced companies which would within a reasonable length of time become self-supporting. The lines were to develop passenger and express business at large, multimotored, completely equipped airliners, which would in turn cut down the dependence on mail revenues.

The Postmaster General was given authority to cut down the rate of payment as he saw fit each year, and that authority was not left unused. The cost of flying the domestic air mail decreased from $1.09 a mile in 1929 to 38 cents a mile in 1933. The price paid by the United States Government for air mail has been consistently lower than that paid by any other government in the world. Eighty-eight cents per mile was the average cost paid in 1932 by the Governments of Great Britain, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Poland, Sweden, and Switzerland. This can be compared with the cost of 54 cents paid by the United States. The lower cost on American routes is particularly significant when it is considered that American pilots are paid from $6,000 to $11,000 a year, or more than twice as much as European pilots.

The most significant feature of the economics of our air-mail system is that it is wholly possible to evolve a sound public policy which will insure the Government a profit on its air-mail system within 3 to 5 years. This can never be achieved in the transportation of mails by steamship, and has been accomplished only by first-class mail on the railroads. The deficit on second- and third-class (railroad) mail alone in the fiscal year 1933 was more than $120,000,000. The deficit on steamship mail was $28,488,000. The latter is a subsidy to develop our merchant marine in competition with foreign shipping, and the former is considered a subsidy to literacy, since most of the loss is caused by transportation of newspapers, although the railroads receive the money for carrying the mail.

There is little doubt that the Postmaster General's cancelation order and the President's emergency call to the Army Air Corps would have been extraordinarily popular if the administration had been able to present evidence of fraud and collusion against all operators to support its case. It would have been a truly Rooseveltian stroke! But what might have been a Rooseveltian success became the Black air-mail fiasco. Admirers of the President and all interested in the continued development of a sound air-transportation system hope that out of the confused record of L'Affaire BLACK will emerge a public policy on air mail worthy of America's first flying President.

Such a policy should have as its basis the lifting of the air mail out of politics into the hands of a nonpartisan commission appointed by the President, with such commissioners serving for long terms in office. It should be a newly created body outside the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other existing agency, but obtaining a desirable degree of coordination with other transportation media through the Federal Coordinator of Transportation. It should not include within its jurisdiction the military or naval air forces and should be limited solely to civil aviation.

The Commission, with assurance from Congress of appropriations for air-mail subsidies not to exceed $10,000,000 annually for 5 years, could proceed to develop a Nation-wide air transport system which would be wholly self-supporting at the end of the 5-year period. Such subsidies, awarded frankly to stimulate technological development of civil air transport and provide a necessary auxiliary for national defense, would be in addition to payments to the commercial contractors for actual mail carried. Payments might most logically be made on the basis of 2 mills per pound-mile, which is equal to the amount collected by the Government from the stamps affixed to the air mail. No subsidy should be given to those companies whose mail volume is sufficient to warrant payments of 50 cents per mile, which should be the maximum. Subsidy payments might well be limited to 25 cents per mile. All contracts or route certificates should run for a period of not less than 10 years. The equities of pioneer operators in the routes they have developed should be recognized.

The commission should have full authority to decide on the public convenience and necessity of all routes. It would most logically eliminate such political routes, extensions and stops which, after a reasonable length of time, give no promise of justifying their existence economically. The money saved from the elimination of such uneconomic routes could be used to develop others which commerce and traffic volume studies show to offer opportunities for greater public service on an economic basis.

The Commission should have rigid control over the accounting procedure of subsidized airlines with powers to obtain full periodic reports and necessary audits. No system of payments to contractors on a cost-plus basis should ever be countenanced, because such a system too easily places a penalty on efficiency and rewards the inefficiency, which results in high operating costs. The prices paid for equipment and the operating efficiency of such equipment as shown by relative operating costs should be subject to rigid scrutiny of the Commission to insure maximum technological development in return for subsidies granted. Salaries might well be limited to a maximum of $18,000 as long as an airline is receiving a Government subsidy.

It would be valuable to coordinate within the jurisdiction of the Commission all agencies of the Government, now scattered in several departments, concerned with civil aeronautics. Policy control of the development of airways would be most important to the effective administration of such a commission, as would the regulations for the design and construction of aircraft and of all civil operations. To place either Army or Navy aviation, or both, within the jurisdiction of the Commission would make its task unwieldy and place the major emphasis on the airplane as a weapon of war rather than a medium of commerce. Such a policy would hamstring promising commercial development of a transportation medium to enable the fullest realization of its military possibilities. Europe's present inferior position to the United States in air transport can be ascribed to its emphasis on the airplane as a military weapon. The desirability of some link between military and commercial aviation cannot be denied, but that can be obtained through the simple procedure of conferences between the two branches. While the facilities of an interdepartmental committee have been available to achieve this desired relationship between the military and civil aviation authorities of the Government in the past, they have not been utilized as effectively as possible.

Although aviation has been the subject of numerous special investigations by Congress, by boards especially appointed by the President and by committees of Congress holding hearings on proposed legislation, the United States is still without a well-defined aviation policy which would permit advance planning with assurance of necessary appropriations. The problem is again squarely up to the White House.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN BUILDINGS, ETC., TO HAITI (H.DOC. NO. 396)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Next October our marine and naval forces will be withdrawn from the Republic of Haiti. During a period of almost 20 years in which they have been stationed in Haiti they have rendered valuable assistance to the Haitian Government and people in training the Haitian constabulary. This constabulary, known as the "garde", has been using certain equipment and material loaned to them by our marine and naval forces, and the Haitian Government would welcome the opportunity of retaining this equipment and material. Also, there are various buildings, barracks, garages, and workshops which our marine and naval forces have constructed and which would be of practical use to the Haitian Government. It would seem to me a fitting climax to the close of the period of special relationship which has existed between Haiti and the United States if our Government were to make a gift of these buildings and of a portion of this material and equipment to the Haitian Government. In the joint statement which the President of Haiti and I issued on April 17 following our conversations during President Vincent's visit to Washington, I expressed my intention of seeking the necessary authorization from the Congress of the United States in order to make such a gift.

With the foregoing in mind, therefore, I recommend the enactment of legislation authorizing me in my discretion to convey to the Government of Haiti, without cost to that Government, such buildings, material, and equipment now in Haiti owned by our Government as may appear to me to be appropriate.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 5, 1934.

PERSONNEL OF FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, there is in conference a communications bill. It has already passed the House. It passed the Senate some few days ago. The proposed law will provide for a communications commission consisting of either five or seven members. There are certain phases of the legislation to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate.

A few days ago the Senate, without a roll call, passed a voluminous bill on the subject of electrical communications—radio, telegraph, telephone, and cable. In all likelihood very few of us were sufficiently familiar with the technical aspects of the subject and its many ramifications to have any very definite idea of what the bill did or did not purport to accomplish. There was virtually no debate on the merits of the bill, and such debate as there was, was largely confined to a particular amendment which was defeated.

The principal impression I have of the bill, and I suppose the same is true of most of the Senators, is that it creates a new commission, a commission on communications, and that the new commission is to exercise the powers heretofore exercised by the Federal Radio Commission over radio stations and by the Interstate Commerce Commission over communication common carriers—telegraph, telephone, cable, and radio—together with certain new and additional powers, particularly over communication common carriers. The combination seems plausible and logical enough, and I voted for it on that basis. Although I regret to have a part in creating any new commissions, this really did not add to the total number now in existence.

The bill has now passed the House. In any event, I am told, the bill is on the President's prescribed list of bills which he has instructed Congress to enact this session and, I suppose, will in all likelihood become law before we adjourn.

My greatest concern, however, is not with the merits or demerits of the bill. What I am concerned with, and what I am sure we all are concerned with, is the personnel of this new commission. The rumor is current that the White House has already prepared its slate of appointments, at least in part, and that conferences on this subject have taken place between the President, certain Senate Democratic leaders, and last but not least, Postmaster General Farley. I do not know what names, if any, have been agreed on, although the same rumor has it that the present Chairman of the Federal Radio Commission is certain of reappointment. I have even been told that to get this reappointment he has had to agree to provide more and better jobs to help assuage the appetite of the Democratic patronage machine, and that this involves the sacrifice of several important and competent members of the Radio Commission staff, including Dr. Jolliffe, the chief engineer, who are so unfortunate as to be suspected of Republican tendencies. I do not charge that this is so; I hope it is not; for it would be a calamity if the Radio Commission should lose the services of a man like Dr. Jolliffe.

It is also said that among those slated to be ousted is Commissioner H. A. Lafount, of the fifth zone, who, the broadcasters tell me, is head and shoulders above the rest of the Commissioners in ability, in industry, in common sense, and in all other qualifications which go toward making a good commissioner.

In view of the fact that I have mentioned the name of Mr. Lafount in order to show what has been heretofore contemplated, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, a newspaper release by Mr. Lafount of August 14, 1933.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., August 14, 1933.

It is the patriotic, if not the bounden and legal duty, of all licensees of radio broadcasting stations to deny their facilities to advertisers who are disposed to defy, ignore, or modify the codes established by the N.R.A., Commissioner Harold A. Lafount declared today in a statement.

Mr. Lafount's observations were based on experiences gained on his recent inspection trip of 107 radio stations in 11 Western and Pacific Coast States. While he found a disposition on the part of practically all broadcasting stations to support enthusiastically the industrial recovery program of the Government, a few isolated cases of flagrant violations were brought to his attention which he feels should not go unnoticed. For instance, in a Pacific coast city, a delegation of business men called on him and protested vehemently against a licensee of a broadcasting station who permitted one of their associates to go on the air offering his service at greatly reduced prices.

The chairman of the delegation said, in effect:

"We have signed the N.R.A. code and we intend to support the Government to the limit in its recovery program. But we feel that we are the victims of a grave injustice when Government agencies, in the form of franchises for the use of radio facilities, are allowed to ruin our business. We should be afforded protection from such practices."

Protestants declared that one of their associates after signing the code had gone on the air with a price-cutting program and as a result he had a big boom in business at their expense.

Of course such trade practices and unfair competition should not be countenanced, Mr. Lafount declared, but there is little or nothing the Commission can do about it. He added:

"Under the Radio Act the Commission has no right of censorship. However, the Commission has the right to take into consideration the kind of programs broadcast when licensees apply for renewals.

"In the present crucial time, when the Government is making a determined effort to restore prosperity and to provide employment for vast groups, by establishing codes for industry, tending to provide more jobs, by reducing working hours and advancing wage scales, it is questionable, in my individual opinion, if the Commission should ignore such protests as the one filed by the delegation mentioned.

"Of course, when the people are fully informed concerning the N.R.A. drive, its purport, and the philosophy back of it, listeners will ignore appeals for business based on price-cutting. In fact, such appeals will be considered unfair, unpatriotic and un-American.

"During the World War those who refused to do their part were labeled 'slackers'—a term of contempt. Those who refuse to aid the Government in this critical time in its war against depression should be placed in the same category. So far they have been dubbed 'chiselers', but to my mind that is too mild a term.

"The success of the recovery drive, it is generally conceded, depends on teamwork on the part of the whole Nation—the buyers as well as the producers. Many are called upon to make sacrifices for the common good and those who refuse to play the game deserve, and undoubtedly will receive, the odium of all true Americans.

"It is to be hoped that radio stations, using valuable facilities loaned to them temporarily by the Government, will not unwittingly be placed in an embarrassing position because of the greed or lack of patriotism on the part of a few unscrupulous advertisers."

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Lafount has been the least subject to political pressure. I regret to say, however, that he is a Republican, one of the two Republicans on the present Commission. What is even more unfortunate, I am told, he failed to vote according to instructions from the White House in a case which the Commission had before it, the so-called "Shreveport-New Orleans case", in which one or more of the other Commissioners shifted their votes back and forth at least three times in an endeavor to accommodate the conflicting desires of Postmaster General Farley and the White House, the latter speaking through Col. Louis Howe, of messkit fame. This, let it be clearly understood, was in a case that had been extensively heard on the oral testimony of witnesses in open hearing, and was supposed to be decided on the merits as disclosed by that evidence.

I should like to inquire of whoever is administration spokesman on this subject, Is there any basis for these rumors?

I desire to suggest that I have introduced a resolution providing for an investigation. It is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. I think we ought to know whether or not many of these things are true.

I for one voted for the new Commission on the assumption, or rather with the hope, that it would be, as the statute purports to make it, a nonpolitical regulatory body. I suppose such a hope is rather a forlorn one in view of the performances of the Federal Radio Commission during the past year under its present chairman, to which subject I shall refer in a moment. In the words of Shelley, however, I—

> Hope till hope creates
> From its own wreck the thing it contemplates.

The point I desire to emphasize is this: Will the Senate of the United States have an opportunity to pass intelligent judgment on the fitness of the new appointees? Or will the appointments be thrust at us at the last moment, with no opportunity to study their merits, thus facing us with the unpleasant dilemma of either accepting the President's choice blindly and with misgiving, or leaving the new Commission completely up in the air by our failure to confirm, to be followed by recess appointment? I for one wish to know who the appointees are, and whether they are the right kind of men for the job. If any of the present members of the Federal Radio Commission are to be appointed, I think we are entitled to know it now.

Because of the rumors I have mentioned, and because of the alleged performances of the Federal Radio Commission during the past year or two, I have introduced a resolution calling for an immediate investigation of the present members of the Federal Radio Commission, with particular reference to their fitness for the new appointments in view of their past record. I do not know how else we can get at the facts in time to be of service to us.

After all, the members of the Federal Radio Commission are, and the members of the new Commission will be, judges who sit to determine important issues vitally affecting citizens of this country on formal notice and hearing of evidence. True, they have other duties which are not judicial in character, such as certain routine administrative functions and certain legislative functions, namely, the making of rules and regulations, violation of which is a crime subject to substantial penalty. In fact, both the present Commission and the new Commission represent that unholy combination of executive, legislative, and judicial powers in one tribunal. The same body makes the rules, determines who shall be proceeded against for violation of the rules, and sits in judgment on the alleged violator. This is particularly true in proceedings involving revocation of a radio license or applications for renewal of license.

I realize that at this late date it is fruitless to declaim on the unsoundness—yes; the unconstitutionality—of this modern device called the administrative tribunal. All lawyers in this body know that the result is that, with minor exceptions, these tribunals are virtually free of any judicial review or control. This is because their decisions are final on issues of fact, and all they need is a scintilla of evidence to support a finding of fact. Give me power to dress up the findings of fact in such a proceeding, and 99 times out of 100 I defy any of you to overturn me on a question of law. Why I am told that at the Radio Commission the Commission first decides a case and afterward has its lawyers write the decision. Ridiculous as it may seem, these lawyers decide and state the Commission's reasons for a particular decision. These are the same lawyers who later must defend the decision from attack in court if an appeal is taken. In the Shreveport-New Orleans case, I am told, a young attorney in the Commission's legal division wrote and rewrote the Commission's decision and the Commission's reasons for the decision three times to keep time to the dance of the Commissioners' chameleonlike votes to the tune of White House music. Mind you, this was all on the basis of the same hearing, the same evidence.

What I am getting at is that if ever there is a time more important than another for exercising vigilance over appointments, it is with respect to appointments to these quasi-judicial administrative tribunals. The highest order of judicial integrity is imperatively necessary, because the temptation to depart from the standard of judicial ethics is great, and the opportunity to yield to that temptation without detection is also great. These men are not appointed for life and, unlike our Federal judges, are all too likely to yield to considerations which may have an effect on their reappointment, or even on the amount of their appropriation. They are legitimately accessible to parties, attorneys, Congressmen, and White House secretaries on matters having to do with the exercise of their purely routine administrative functions, and perhaps also their legislative functions. This makes it all too easy for them to be similarly accessible to persons who wish to talk to them in chambers about some pending case. Having made the very rules under which they decide cases, it is all too easy for them to wink at a violation in one case and to make it the vehicle for drastic discipline, such as closing down a radio station, in another, although in the latter case the real reason may be something entirely behind the scenes.

I can conceive of no administrative tribunal where judicial integrity great enough to resist these temptations is more important than the proposed commission on communications. Freedom of speech over the air is at stake when we give the power to license and to destroy. Uncontrolled power to regulate our avenues of communication, our telegraph and cable systems, is the power to throttle the transmission of intelligence, with its consequent effect on the press and the public platform. We must have men of the highest caliber on this new commission.

Mr. President, I am not satisfied that certain of the present members of the Federal Radio Commission possess the necessary qualifications. I do not say they do not, but I do say there is enough evidence of their being politically minded and not judicially minded to warrant our being very careful before we assent to their appointment to the new commission. I think it is fully as important that they be called before a committee which will study their qualifications as in the case of judges.

I have here a series of articles written by Arthur Sears Henning, printed in the Chicago Tribune, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks. These articles are of date of May 4, May 6, May 8, May 9, May 10, May 11, May 12, and May 13. They give a history of the very matters I am now discussing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The newspaper articles referred to are as follows:

SEE CENSORSHIP AS GOAL OF UNITED STATES WIRES CONTROL—CHARGES PROGRAM TO CURB PRESS

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 4.—Charges that the "new dealers" are reaching out for political domination and censorship of the telegraph and telephone services and of the transmission of news to newspapers will figure prominently in the consideration of the communications bill by Congress.

Although these accusations are vigorously denied by the Roosevelt administration, which has sponsored the proposed legislation to place all communications under control of a Federal commission, the opponents of the project see nothing more nor less than the extension to the wire services and the press of the present political control of radio.

A score or more of episodes, some of them highly ludicrous, are being cited as illuminative of the subserviency and numerous other Democratic powers that be.

RAMIFICATIONS REVEALED

These incidents disclose the ramifications of political influence in the Commission, making and unmaking decisions involving the rights and interests of radio-communications systems and the fate of radio broadcasting stations. They reveal those with investments in radio service at stake leading a precarious business existence at the mercy of political machinations.

They show that the efficacy of political influence in the Commission is generally recognized and that applicants for licenses and other rulings habitually invoke the most powerful of such influences at their command. Fortunate is he who is able to obtain the intervention of the White House, the slightest hint from which works wonders in the Commission.

According to the information obtained by Senators opposing the legislation, at least one officer of the Radio Commission has close relations with certain lawyers specializing in practice before the Commission. These lawyers are thus enabled to learn with celerity the decisions, rulings, and other actions of the Commission in supposedly secret session and to sell their services to clients seeking a reversal or modification of orders.

INTIMIDATION IS CHARGED

Much of the evidence assembled shows to what extent the broadcasting concerns have been intimidated by the Radio Commission and by the power of the Roosevelt administration to crack down on them through the Radio Commission for offending the White House or the Democratic high command. It also shows how the broadcasting systems seek to curry favor with the administration by giving time free of charge to administration officials and by denying the air to critics of the administration. By this means an effective censorship of radio broadcasting already has been established.

Senator WALLACE WHITE (Republican, Maine) and other leaders of the opposition to the communications bill declare the measure the opening wedge to political domination of all mediums of communication and to censorship and intimidation of the press. They contend that a commission empowered to regulate communications systems would be subject on a large scale to the political influences to which the Radio Commission has yielded.

The telephone and telegraph companies, as well as the commercial radio concerns, would be at the mercy of a politically constituted commission eager to translate into action the slightest whim of the Executive or of the "big shots" of the party in power. Just as the Radio Commission warned all broadcasters to beware of criticism of the N.R.A. on pain of losing their licenses, the communications commission, it is pointed out, might warn all telegraph, telephone, and wireless systems to transmit no news or comment unfavorable to the administration.

CALLED BEGINNING OF END

In this manner, without establishing an outright censorship or control of the press, the administration would be enabled to determine what telegraphic dispatches from Washington newspapers should or should not print. Such tampering with the stream of information flowing to the press would undermine public confidence in the press in the same manner that public confidence in the independence of radio broadcasters has already been shaken. It would be the beginning of the end of the freedom of the press.

The Radio Commission consists of the following members: Eugene O. Sykes (Democrat, Mississippi), chairman; Thad H. Brown (Republican, Ohio), vice chairman; Harold A. Lafount (Republican, Utah); James H. Hanley (Democrat, Nebraska).

Representative ANNING S. PRALL (Democrat, New York) has been appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of William D. L. Starbuck, but will not assume office until Congress adjourns.

The Radio Commission, it transpires, is not the only quasi judicial body that is dominated by partisan political influence. By his removal of Republican members of the Power Commission and the Federal Trade Commission on the ground that they were not in sympathy with his policies, the President destroyed the independence of members unwilling to risk the loss of a lucrative job.

TARIFF COMMISSION CITED

Subserviency of the Tariff Commission to the White House was admitted a few days ago in testimony by its Republican holdover chairman, Robert Lincoln O'Brien, before the Senate Finance Committee.

"The President appoints the members of the Tariff Commission", said Mr. O'Brien. "He naturally holds certain views concerning the tariff. It is not hard for him to find men in either party who think as he does. The members of the Tariff Commission are human, you know, and want to keep their jobs. At all times the White House and the Tariff Commission are not—er—well, unrelated factors.

"I am estopped from saying most of the things I know from a sense of official propriety. If it weren't for official propriety I could tell of one President who became very angry with a former chairman because he wouldn't do what the President wanted done."

The Shipping Board was notoriously subservient to the White House and other political influences, not to mention representatives of various shipping interests who knew how to reach members of the Board with subtle forms of bribery, as revealed by a recent congressional investigation.

OTHER INCIDENTS RECALLED

Even the oldest and most securely established of our quasi judicial bodies, the Interstate Commerce Commission, has not been immune from political influences. In the depression of 1921 Mr. Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce, was vigorously advocating a reduction of freight rates on coal, iron, and other basic commodities. President Harding one day stalked over to the Commission in person, and in a secret session with the members sought to obtain such action. How the members reacted to this pressure by their appointing power was never revealed. Some months later the Commission ordered a 10-percent reduction of the rates on all commodities.

In the lake cargo coal case the Commission decided in favor of the southern coal fields and against Pennsylvania. This incensed the Pennsylvanians, and at the first opportunity Senator DAVID A. REED (Republican, Pennsylvania) took the warpath. When the nomination of Thomas F. Woodlock to the Commission was under consideration by the Senate in March 1926 Senator REED said that Pennsylvania deeply resented having been passed over in the matter of appointments to the Commission and "that has inspired us to protest against this and other appointments."

While the Woodlock nomination was being held up by Mr. REED in the Senate, the White House announced in a formal statement that President Coolidge in future appointments to the Commission would give special consideration to the "South, Southwest, and Pennsylvania." Senator REED promptly withdrew his opposition to Woodlock, and the nomination was confirmed. A few months later Mr. Coolidge appointed Cyrus E. Woods of Pennsylvania to the Commission, but the nomination failed of confirmation.

COMMISSIONER CHANGES VOTE

At that time the lake cargo coal case was before the Commission again for a rehearing, and the southerners were up in arms against the appointment of a Pennsylvanian whose vote would reverse the ruling of the Commission so as to favor Pennsylvania. They beat the nomination of Woods, but they had not reckoned with the Wisconsin member of the Commission, John J. Esch. In the first trial of the case Esch voted in favor of the southerners and against Pennsylvania. In the rehearing he voted for Pennsylvania, and his vote reversed the ruling and gave the decision to Pennsylvania.

This happened close to the end of the term of Mr. Esch, who was a candidate for reappointment. He was accused of switching his vote in order to win a reappointment from an administration that was visibly giving aid and comfort to the Pennsylvanians. Mr. Esch indignantly denied the charge, asserting that he had voted differently because of a different showing of facts on the rehearing. President Coolidge reappointed Mr. Esch, but the nomination failed of confirmation after another airing of the coal case in the Senate.

Senators have not hesitated to browbeat the quasi-judicial commissions, demanding favorable decisions on pain of refusal to confirm the renomination of commissioners. Congressmen as well as Senators have not hesitated to demand favors on pain of a curtailment of appropriations. So notorious at one time became such political interference that the Interstate Commerce Commission addressed a letter to the national legislators reminding them that it is obligated to decide cases on their merits without consideration of political influence.

TRY POLITICAL APPROACH

Persons seeking to influence these commissions invariably try to approach members through the political powers responsible for the selection of the commissioners. It may be the White House which is the appointing power, or Senators, who are the confirming power, or the national committee, which is the patronage-dispensing power. How to "reach" a commissioner and what commissioners cannot be "reached" is a part of the underground information possessed by the politicians, political lawyers, and lobbyists of Washington.

Some members of these quasi-judicial commissions habitually consult the White House on decisions and votes. One member of the Radio Commission told me that he had asked the White House on several occasions whether President Roosevelt had any preference in a pending decision of a controversy between rival radio interests. Invariably, he said, he had been told by a White House secretary that the President was not interested, and that the Commissioner was at liberty to vote his convictions.

WHITE HOUSE TAKES PART IN RADIO CONTROL—HOWE AIDS BOARD TO ALTER RULING

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 6.—Of all the instances of White House dictation to the Radio Commission, probably the most notorious is that of the Shreveport-New Orleans case. In this case the White House summoned the acting chairman of the Commission and procured his promise to reverse the Commission's decision.

If the White House does not hesitate to use its tremendous power to shape the decisions of the quasi-judicial Radio Commission, contend the opponents of the pending communications bill, it may be expected to dominate the quasi-judicial commission which this legislation proposes to set up to control the telegraph and telephone systems and radio.

In the manner in which the White House dictated the decision of the Shreveport-New Orleans case, the White House could cause the communications commission to prohibit transmission to newspapers by wire or wireless systems of dispatches critical of the administration. Thus would a censorship of the press be achieved.

TROUBLE AT SHREVEPORT

For years KWKH, at Shreveport, La., had been a notoriously bad actor, being operated by one Henderson under the name of Hello World Broadcasting Corporation. Henderson frequently broadcast when intoxicated, and his obscenity (in violation of a specific provision of the Radio Act) had shocked the radio audiences. The station was of fairly high power on a clear channel. It divided time with WWL, at New Orleans, owned and operated by Loyola University, a Roman Catholic institution.

Henderson had been before the Commission on several occasions on the score of his broadcasting misbehavior, but each time had escaped discipline through political pressure, although other stations have been put off the air for far less serious offenses.

Finally WWL at New Orleans applied for full time on the frequency, which would mean the deletion of KWKH. The application was heard by a Commission examiner who recommended that WWL be granted full time. Then the situation was complicated by an application for assignment of Henderson's license to a new corporation at Shreveport, to which Henderson desired to sell his station. The law requires the Commission's approval of an assignment of license. There were oral arguments before the Commission which were virtually between the proposed assignee (who really represented Henderson's interests) and the New Orleans station.

POLITICS, RELIGION, RADIO

Following the arguments the Commission in executive session decided in favor of granting full time to the New Orleans station. The decision was unanimous. Henderson and the proposed assignee immediately learned of it. They got busy at once pulling all the customary political wires leading into the Commission. But this wire pulling at first had no effect. The Commission could not be budged and everything was all set to take Henderson's station off the air and give full time to the Catholic institution.

At that juncture the Shreveport interests bethought themselves of Senator J. T. ROBINSON, of Arkansas, Democratic leader of the Senate. He seemed to them to be the logical man to champion their cause against the Loyola University's station and to go the limit in procuring a reversal of the Radio Commission's decision.

Shreveport is situated in northern Louisiana not far from the Arkansas border, and Arkansas constituted a large part of the Shreveport station's radio audience. Senator ROBINSON is a pillar in the Methodist church and resides at the Methodist Building opposite the Capitol. Moreover, he is on bad terms with Senator HUEY LONG, who was favoring the cause of the New Orleans station.

SENATOR ROBINSON EXPLAINS

Pressure was brought to bear on Senator ROBINSON to use his influence to save the Henderson station from being taken off the air. He says that he acted upon receipt of several hundred appeals of Shreveport citizens by wire and letter. He explains that he did so because of representations that Shreveport could not obtain justice through HUEY LONG, and had appealed as a last resort to a near neighbor, the Senator from Arkansas.

Senator ROBINSON says that he telephoned the White House, asking that something be done to save the Shreveport station. He does not remember whether he talked to the President himself or to one of his Secretaries. At any rate, the Arkansas Senator's appeal soon lodged in the hands of Col. [Kentucky] Louis M. Howe, the silent, elusive, mystery man of the White House Secretariat. Mr. Howe went into action without delay.

According to his version of the incident, Mr. Howe telephoned Herbert L. Pettey, secretary of the Commission, that the White House was interested in seeing that no injustice be done to Shreveport. He denies that he went any further than that. Of course, he would not need to. The merest hint officially conveyed of what the White House wanted would be sufficient. Incidentally, young Mr. Pettey was appointed secretary of the Commission at the instance of Mr. Howe. Mr. Pettey handled radio arrangements for the Democratic National Committee in the 1932 campaign. When Mr. Howe got the Radio Commission job for Pettey he remarked that the White House thus would be able to keep track of what was going on in the Commission.

Mr. Pettey, who is a facile denier, denied that Mr. Howe or anyone else at the White House had communicated with him about the New Orleans-Shreveport case or about any other radio case.

CALLS VICE CHAIRMAN

It turns out, however, that Mr. Howe concealed from me the most effective thing he did to procure a reversal of the decision in the New Orleans-Shreveport case. He summoned Vice Chairman Thad H. Brown, of the Radio Commission, to the White House. Mr. Brown was then acting chairman of the Commission because of the absence of Chairman Eugene O. Sykes in Mexico.

Mr. Brown told his fellow Commissioners what happened when he was summoned to the presence of Mr. Howe. The White House secretary told Mr. Brown that the White House felt it most essential to bring home the bacon for Senator ROBINSON. The majority leader of the Senate, upon whom the President leaned most heavily in the hour of need, had earnestly requested that the Shreveport station be kept on the air and the White House was disposed to move heaven and earth to get what the Senator wanted.

Mr. Howe, it appears, waxed quite affecting in his efforts to persuade Acting Chairman Brown to procure a reversal of the decision. He painted a distressful picture of what would happen if Shreveport were taken off the air. The New Orleans station, which Mr. Howe said was under the thumb of HUEY LONG, would pour forth a stream of propaganda designed to injure JOE ROBINSON, whom LONG bitterly hates, and there JOE ROBINSON would be next door in Arkansas without a radio station to combat the abuse emanating from New Orleans. Mr. Howe is said to have got quite watery about the eyes at his own recital.

CITES UNANIMOUS DECISION

Vice Chairman Brown is said to have assured Mr. Howe that he, for one, would be willing to change his vote to accommodate the White House. But he pointed out that the decision in favor of New Orleans had been unanimous, and that it would be necessary to change 3 votes before the finding could be reversed.

Well, that was exactly what happened. Mr. Brown and two other members of the Commission changed their votes, the application of the New Orleans station for full time was denied, and the Shreveport station was left on the air. The decision was then made public. In the meantime Rosel Hyde, of the Legal Division of the Commission, had had to write and rewrite the decision to justify contrary findings on the same evidence.

When the decision was published the Catholics were greatly aroused, and when they learned that the White House had been instrumental in effecting the reversal they bore down on the Executive Office. They were particularly incensed by the representations that the New Orleans station was under the thumb of HUEY LONG. When the Catholic dignitaries finished with Mr. Howe, the White House Secretary felt that he had gone off on the wrong tack. Efforts were then initiated to extricate the White House from its embarrassing position by some concession to the New Orleans station, but nothing has come of them up to date. The New Orleans and Shreveport stations are still dividing time, and Henderson is out of the Shreveport set-up.

A CASE IN VIRGINIA

How the mere nod of a Congressman, with power of life and death over the meal ticket of these quasi-judicial commissions commands instant compliance is illustrated by the case of WDBJ at Roanoke, Va., which applied for an increase in power. Virginia already had stations the aggregate power of which exceeded the quota allotted to that State. To grant the application would mean that Virginia would be over quota to a greater extent than before.

The Commission was about to hold a hearing on the application when Representative CLIFTON A. WOODRUM, Democratic Member from the Roanoke district, intervened. Now, Mr. WOODRUM is the particular power in Congress of whom the quasi-judicial commissions stand in awe. He is the chairman of the subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee which frames the appropriation bills for these commissions and other so-called "independent offices." It is within his power to treat a commission lavishly in allotment of Government funds or to starve it by tightening the purse strings.

In a meeting of the Commission, Chairman Sykes stated that Congressman WOODRUM had told him he would like to see the increased power allowed to WDBJ. Mr. Sykes explained that WDBJ is "one of Mr. WOODRUM'S pets." Enough said. The Commission thereupon granted the increased power to the Roanoke station without a hearing.

RADIO LAWYERS CREDITED WITH INSIDE TRACK—MULLEN'S FRIEND WINS CASES BEFORE BOARD

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 8.—A communications commission, as proposed in the pending communications bill, with its power of life and death over wire and wireless systems and the telegraphic news of the press, would be a bonanza for the political lawyers, if one may judge from their operations in and about the Radio Commission.

They have garnered rich pickings at the Radio Commission, pickings that are small change, however, compared with the fees which might logically be exacted if the infinitely greater investment in the telegraph and telephone systems and the press for protection of rights threatened by governmental regimentation, experimentation, censorship, and persecution were involved.

EVEN BENEFICIARY IS SUPERVISED

The influencing of decisions of the Radio Commission by the political lawyers is so notorious as to have caused wide-spread comment and loosed a flood of gossip. One of the political lawyers himself remarked to me that the state of affairs at the Commission in this particular is somewhat odoriferous.

Although the Radio Commission is supposedly a quasi-judicial body, many applicants for privileges, whether legitimate or illegitimate, have found themselves merely butting their heads against a stone wall until they hired one of the lawyers reputed to have the "inside track" at the Commission. Tips on the lawyers to be employed for the most favorable results are procurable at the Commission itself.

A leading specialist in business before the Radio Commission is Paul D. P. Spearman, close personal friend of Herbert L. Pettey, secretary of the Commission.

MULLEN, JACKSON ARE POPULAR

Arthur Mullen and Robert Jackson also have a large Radio Commission practice. Mr. Mullen was until recently Democratic national committeeman for Nebraska. He was floor manager of the Roosevelt forces in the Chicago convention. Mr. Jackson was secretary of the Democratic national committee and committeeman for New Hampshire. Both were forced off the committee by the President's declaration that he considered it improper for national committeemen to be accepting retainers from clients on the assumption that the committeemen had access to the back door of the administration.

Commissioner James H. Hanley owes his appointment to the Radio Commission solely to Mr. Mullen. He was closely associated with Mr. Mullen in the law business and in Democratic politics in Nebraska for many years.

JOB FOR MULLEN FRIEND

Mr. Mullen wanted to be Attorney General, but Mr. Roosevelt countered with the offer of an appointment to the Radio Commission. Mr. Mullen declined this for himself, but said he had a friend for the place. Mr. Roosevelt, about to be inaugurated, asked Mr. Mullen to send him the friend's name. Mr. Hanley was appointed forthwith.

Elmer W. Pratt was chief examiner of the Commission. He resigned a year ago and set up as a specialist in Radio Commission business. He became closely associated with Mr. Mullen, having an office adjoining Mr. Mullen's until recently, when he moved to the floor above. Mr. Pratt, from the start, has handled all the radio business for clients of Mr. Mullen.

QUINCY-PEORIA RADIO FIGHT

One of the most bitterly contested radio cases and one presenting a bewildering interplay of political influences was that of Peoria versus Quincy, Ill. WTAD at Quincy and WMBD at Peoria were sharing time on 1,440 kilocycles. Each applied for full time on the frequency which would have had the effect of putting the other station off the air. Emory H. Lancaster, owner of the Quincy station, also wanted to remove it to East St. Louis.

After a hearing last fall the Commission decided in favor of the application of the Quincy station. At that time the Peoria station was represented by Attorney Horace Lohnes. Having lost, the owners of the Peoria station sought a rehearing and hired an additional lawyer—Elmer Pratt. The appearance of Mr. Pratt in the case generally was supposed to indicate that the powerful Mr. Mullen had been retained.

PEORIA APPEAL EFFECTIVE

After the second hearing of the case, Mr. Mullen's appointee, Commissioner Hanley, changed his vote and swung the decision in favor of Peoria. Mr. Hanley denies he changed his vote because Mr. Mullen's radio specialist, Elmer Pratt, had appeared in the case. He says that he changed his vote because the chairman of the Commission, Eugene O. Sykes, changed his vote and produced a majority in favor of allowing the Quincy station to move to East St. Louis.

Mr. Hanley says he thought it most objectionable to locate another station in the St. Louis area, and by changing his vote produced a majority against the Quincy application. Mr. Mullen denies that he was retained by the Peoria station. This, he says, was Mr. Pratt's individual case.

WGES, which is operated by Guyon's Paradise Ballroom in Chicago, has an allotment of three-sevenths of the time on 1,360 kilocycles. The other four-sevenths of the time became available when WIND, at Gary, with which it was sharing time, obtained another frequency.

MR. MULLEN AND WGES

WGES applied for temporary authority to use the other four-sevenths of the time. It was repeatedly turned down by the Commission, but finally got a permit for 28 days. It was reported that the retention of Arthur Mullen brought about this concession. Mr. Mullen says he had represented WGES all along, but was unable to get the temporary permit, which the station obtained through other representatives.

"Arthur Mullen is my friend and the only person to whom I am indebted for appointment to the Commission", said Commissioner Hanley. "But we never discuss radio matters and I have voted against him and Pratt oftener than I have voted for them."

KSEI, at Pocatello, Idaho, asked for a change in frequency to 890 kilocycles. This was granted without a hearing. KFPY, Spokane, Wash., at the same time, had filed an application for the same frequency, but its application had not reached Washington, being in the hands of the local inspector. The Spokane station appealed and the court reversed the Commission for failing to give a hearing before granting the Pocatello application.

SENATOR GAINS HIS POINT

After the hearing had been accorded the Commission decided again in favor of Pocatello. Senator CLARENCE C. DILL (Democrat, Washington) received an underground report of the Commission's decision and protested with such effectiveness that the Commission held up the opinion. Eventually, Spokane won.

Senator DILL is the father of the present Radio Act and wields a powerful influence at the Commission. The gossip was that the Commission ruled after the hearing in favor of KSEI instead of KFPY because the confusing similarity of sound of the call letters caused a radio Commissioner to misunderstand Senator DILL's pleasure in their telephone conversation. This Senator DILL denies.

"DRAG" IN RADIO FORECASTS FATE WIRES MAY FACE—POLITICS SHOWN TO RULE BOARD'S DECISIONS

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 9.—White House dictation to the Radio Commission and other quasi-judicial Federal boards under the Roosevelt administration is not an innovation, it appears. It obtained also under the Hoover administration.

The only period free of such interference by the White House with the Radio Commission, at least, was the Coolidge administration. This is the testimony of a former member of the Commission, a Democrat. Mr. Coolidge, he said, would not tolerate the subjection of the Commission to White House influence and always backed up the Commission's rulings.

After the Coolidge regime, however, the Commission became the football of political influence, and its reputation for integrity and independence suffered accordingly.

WIRES HAVE REASON TO FEAR

"Of course, the wire systems and the newspapers have reason to fear the creation of a communications commission to control all communications", said a radio company official today. "They know they will be at the mercy of a new and powerful agency of a political bureaucracy. They know that they will have to reckon with White House domination of the Commission and with all sorts of political manipulations just as we have had to in the case of the Radio Commission."

In the latter part of the Hoover administration there arose a famous radio case in which political influence figured prominently. Through such political influence two Chicago broadcasting stations, representing an investment of $400,000, were wiped out and a reallocation of wave lengths was effected that has strengthened the Columbia Broadcasting System, one of the two chains (the other being the National Broadcasting Co.) which are rapidly absorbing the broadcasting facilities of the country.

DETAILS OF THE DEAL

WJKS (now known as WIND) was a station at Gary, Ind., operating four-sevenths of the time on 1,360 kilocycles. Ralph Atlass, brother of Leslie Atlass, who is president of the Columbia corporation in Chicago, bought for a song the controlling interest in the Gary station and set out to develop it into an important and valuable station. On its wave length the Gary station could cover Gary but not Chicago. To cover Chicago he needed a different wave length.

For his purposes Mr. Atlass coveted the frequency 560 kilocycles, on which two Chicago stations, WIBO and WPCC, were dividing time. The owners of the Gary station applied to the Commission for the frequency held by the Chicago stations with an aggregate investment of $400,000. This was tantamount to a proposal to put WIBO and WPCC off the air. The ground for the application was that Illinois had more than its quota and Indiana less than its quota of broadcasting facilities.

LONG HEARING ENSUES

There was a long hearing before the Commission's chief examiner, Ellis A. Yost, a man of unquestioned integrity, in which the Gary station owners made what was commonly regarded as a weak showing of justification for the favor they sought. They lost out completely before the examiner. Mr. Yost, in his report to the Commission, recommended that the application of the Gary station be denied, and that the two Chicago stations be permitted to retain their wave lengths.

At this point politics enters. The owners of the Gary station had retained as counsel Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, a political lawyer famed for her successful wire pulling in the Hoover administration. She was now reinforced by the political influence of the late Representative Will Wood, of the Gary district. Wood had a somewhat stormy meeting with the chairman of the Commission, but was able to bring such pressure to bear that the body rejected the examiner's recommendation and granted the Gary station the wave length held by the Chicago stations.

NO ORAL ARGUMENT

The Commission took this step without giving any opportunity for oral argument. The Chicago stations were put off the air in October 1931. WIBO and WPCC appealed to the courts. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia reversed the Commission, holding the decision arbitrary and capricious. The case then went to the Supreme Court, which declared it could not disturb the Commission's decision.

Having obtained the coveted wave length, the Gary station became virtually a second outlet for the Columbia System in the Chicago area, the other station being WBBM, headed by Leslie Atlass. The Gary station is managed by Ralph Atlass from offices adjoining his brother's. The Gary station moved its transmitter somewhat nearer Chicago and is now making technical changes to improve its reception on the extreme north side of Chicago.

The Gary station obtained the Chicago station's wave length upon representations that it would function as an Indiana and not a Chicago station and would give a peculiarly local service to the foreign population of Gary. Complaints were made to the Commission that this understanding was being violated and that the Gary station was in reality a Chicago station, but they were ignored. Were it not for the influence of the Columbia System, these complaints would have been given a hearing.

COLUMBIA ON THE INSIDE

The National Broadcasting Co. enjoyed special favor at the Radio Commission under the Hoover administration, but the Columbia System has the inside track under the Roosevelt administration, a circumstance that suggests that with a commission in control of all communications, the fortunes of the telegraph and telephone systems and the newspaper telegraph services would vary with the political complexion of the party in power.

The Commission granted the wave length to the Gary station on the ground that Illinois was over and Indiana under quota. But while it was engaged in destroying WIBO and WPPC the Commission granted additional facilities to other stations in Chicago, thus increasing Illinois' excess quota. One of those thus favored was Columbia's station WBBM.

The sequel is almost as interesting. After the Gary station had taken over the WIBO length several stations applied for the wave length vacated by the Gary station, among them a South Bend, Ind., station, which was dividing time with an Indianapolis station. Both are outlets of the Columbia System. Recently, after a hearing, one of the Commission's examiners, Ralph Walker, recommended that the Commission give the South Bend station the Gary station's former wave length and grant the Indianapolis station full time on its present wave length. The Commission has yet to act on this recommendation.

BROOKLYN RADIO TANGLE CREATES CRY OF "POLITICS"—SILENCING OF FOUR STATIONS CONSIDERED

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 10.—Charges and countercharges of improper influences operating in and about the Radio Commission have given a sensational setting to what is known as the "Brooklyn mess."

The Commission has under consideration a recommendation by its chief examiner to put four Brooklyn broadcasting stations off the air. In the background are a number of other radio interests scrambling to get the wave length that will become vacant if the four Brooklyn stations are deleted.

Representatives of the Brooklyn stations assert that powerful political influences are being brought to bear on the Commission in behalf of the interests that seek their wave length. On the other hand, according to members of the Commission, there has been a steady procession of Senators and Congressman to their Chambers to persuade or coerce the Commissioners to keep the Brooklyn stations on the air.

USE SAME WAVE LENGTH

The four stations in question are WARD, WBBC, WLTH, and WVFW, all located in Brooklyn and all dividing time with each other on the same wave length, 1,400 kilocycles. About a year ago, as frequently happens when so many stations are forced to divide time on the same wave length, these stations became involved in a dispute with each other and took their controversy before the Commission, each asking for more time at the expense of the others.

At the outset the case followed the Commission's normal procedure, and the matter was referred to an examiner, in this case Ralph L. Walker. For certain technical legal reasons the Commission's rules require that in such a dispute all the parties file applications for renewal license so that there will be no legal obstacles in the way of a Commission decision changing the allotment of time or even putting one or more of the stations off the air so as to give the time to the other stations.

NINE-DAY HEARING HELD

An extended hearing was held before Examiner Walker, lasting 9 days, during the latter part of August and the early part of September. At the time of the hearing and for a considerable period thereafter these four stations were the only parties to the dispute. The normal outcome in such a case would be a decision leaving the stations as they were, or rearranging their time, or, in case good cause were shown, deleting one or more of them and giving the time to the other stations.

On November 27, 1933, long before the examiner had made any report or recommendation in the matter, an entirely new factor appeared in the situation. A corporation known as the Brooklyn Daily Eagle Broadcasting Co., Inc., filed an application with the Commission to establish a new station in Brooklyn on the wave length now used by the four stations. The applicant is, in part at least, a subsidiary of the Brooklyn Eagle, but it is said that other persons are interested in it.

ENJOYS OFFICIAL FRIENDSHIPS

Its attorney is Paul D. P. Spearman, who is reputed to enjoy close relations with Herbert L. Pettey, politically minded secretary of the Commission. Mr. Spearman, who was formerly assistant general counsel of the Commission, was brought to Washington and placed on the legal staff in 1929 by his Mississippi friend, Eugene O. Sykes, present Chairman of the Commission.

Mr. Spearman denies that he has sought to influence either Chairman Sykes or Secretary Pettey in this or any other radio case; denies any close relationship with Mr. Pettey and denies that Mr. Pettey sends him radio clients, asserting that he has had no clients in this first year of the Roosevelt administration that he did not have under the preceding Republican administration.

Another who is seeking the wave length of the four Brooklyn stations is the watch manufacturer, Arte Bulova, proprietor of the WNEW broadcasting station. Mr. Bulova's principal political friend at court is Representative WILLIAM I. SIROVICH (Democrat, New York). Contingent upon the acquisition of the Brooklyn wave length an offer to manage the broadcasting has been made by both Mr. Bulova and the Brooklyn Eagle Broadcasting Co. to an official of the Columbia Broadcasting System. Congressman SIROVICH helped Mr. Bulova present this offer, but he denies financial interest in the Bulova station.

DINNER ATTRACTS ATTENTION

Much significance has been attached to a dinner Congressman SMOVICH gave on the eve of the oral arguments before the Radio Commission on the question of putting the Brooklyn stations off the air. Mr. Bulova and the members of the Radio Commission were among the guests. Mr. SIROVICH indignantly denies the significance. He says he had 110 guests, including members not only of the Radio but the Tariff, Trade, Power, and other Commissions.

Another concern seeking the Brooklyn wave length is the American Radio Production Institute, Inc., headed by Ralph Steinburg, who is in the foreign-language division of the N.R.A.

Up to date the case has proceeded satisfactorily to those coveting the wave lengths of the Brooklyn stations. Examiner Walker recommended that all four Brooklyn stations be put off the air. He does not claim that any of the four stations has violated the law or any of the Commission's regulations, or has been guilty of any misconduct in the usual meaning of the word.

HITS FOREIGN-LANGUAGE PROGRAM

Examiner Walker says, however, that "the denial of the applications here involved would result in decreasing the present overquota status of the State of New York", but omits to mention that within recent months the Commission has on several occasions added to the supposed overquota status of this same State. He criticizes three of the stations by saying that "an excessive amount of time has been devoted to commercial foreign-language programs", although it was this same feature of the programs of WIND at Gary, Ind., that the Federal Radio Commission found to be a great virtue and as in part justifying its destruction of the Chicago stations WIBO and WPCC. Examiner Walker also says that "a number of stations render a good service throughout the Brooklyn area and it does not appear that the present applicants add materially to the service so received."

In other words, these stations may be put off the air because they are not better than nor different from other stations in the same city.

RADIO BOARD'S RULING CREATES CAPITAL GOSSIP—DECISIONS ARE UNMADE BY MYSTERIOUS INFLUENCES

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 11, 1934.—The mysterious influences that make and unmake the decisions of the quasi-judicial Radio Commission are discernible in a multitude of cases coming before that tribunal.

One that created no end of gossip in official Washington was the case of the Los Angeles broadcasting stations. KTM and KELW, of Los Angeles, were dividing time on the same wave length. In the fall of 1932 they were involved in a long hearing before one of the Commission's examiners of their applications for renewal of license.

The examiner recommended that the applications be denied and the stations put off the air because of their unsavory broadcasting performances. After the examiner had made this report to the Commission the Hearst evening paper in Los Angeles purchased an option of both stations and an application for assignment of the licenses of KHM and KELW to the newspaper was filed with the Commission.

MUST BE O.K.'D BY COMMISSION

Under the law it is necessary that such assignments be approved by the Commission.

In the meantime other interests had filed application for the use of the frequency of KTM and KELW when the two stations should be put off the air. One such application was filed by Don Lee, Inc., which operates a chain of broadcasting stations on the Pacific coast and which proposed to establish a new station at Redlands, Calif., which has no station.

KTM and KELW were represented by Attorney Paul D. P. Spearman, political protégé of Eugene O. Sykes, chairman, and close personal friend of Herbert L. Pettey, secretary of the Commission. Mr. Pettey, it will be recalled, was placed in this position by Col. (Kentucky) Louis M. Howe, President Roosevelt's secretary, to constitute a liaison between the White House and the Commission.

Mr. Spearman didn't get to first base in the hearing before Chief Examiner Yost, but he fared better when the case came before the Commission. The Commission reversed the examiner and granted the application of the two stations for renewal of their licenses. It ordered a hearing on the assignment of the licenses to the Hearst paper and on the competing application. It also ordered rehearing on the license renewal applications of the two stations.

RECORD OF STATIONS IS AIRED

At these new hearings the unsavory record of the two stations was aired again and the financial responsibility of the Hearst paper inquired into. Another examiner, Ralph Walker, heard the case this time and he also filed a report recommending that KTM and KELW be put off the air. He also recommended that the application for assignment of the licenses to the Hearst paper be denied and that the Don Lee application be granted.

There were oral arguments before the full Commission. At first the Commission decided to deny all the applications, including those of KTM and KELW. This leaked out and the wire pulling began to get the Commission to change its decision. There were rumors that the White House intervened to cause the Commission to change its decision in this case, as it did in the case of the New Orleans and Shreveport stations. This is denied at the White House. Mr. Spearman, who by that time was representing the Hearst paper, denies that any political influence was exerted. The Commission eventually granted the Hearst application, and the KTM and KELW wave length was transferred to the Los Angeles paper.

CHURCHMEN MAKE COMPLAINT

The procedure of the Commission in all cases at the time lent itself to the invocation of political influences to procure a reversal of decisions. It was the custom of the Commission to take what it called a "tentative vote" on a case, but no public announcement of the decision would be made until the law branch had written it. This might take several weeks, in which time the action would leak out and the defeated parties would bring their political influence to bear to induce the Commission to reverse itself. This happened so frequently and the legal department was compelled to write and rewrite the decision so often that the situation became notorious.

Commissioner James H. Hanley says that he was instrumental in procuring a change of the procedure in the interest of reform. Now a decision is announced as soon as it is voted and written up afterward by the law office.

KFYO, a Lubbock, TEX., broadcasting station, became involved in some unpleasantness with its radio audience. There was complaint of the character of its programs, emanating chiefly from churchmen, it appears. An application for its facilities was made by interests desiring to establish a station at Abilene, Tex.

This application was about to be granted by the Commission when Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON (Democrat), of Texas, intervened to save KFYO from being put off the air. BLANTON marshaled an array of Methodist and Baptist church pastors to repudiate the complaints against KFYO. Mr. BLANTON asserted that the whole complaint when boiled down was that T. E. Kirksey, owner of KFYO, had permitted a singer to broadcast the Volga Boatmen song.

MORTGAGED TO CONGRESSMAN'S SON

Congressman BLANTON won out, and KFYO still is on the air. The Texas Congressman stated that he was representing Mr. Kirksey merely in the relationship of Congressman and constituent and without pay. It is against the law for a Senator or Congressman to practice before the administrative departments and commissions for compensation. Later it transpired that a mortgage on KFYO had been recorded at Abilene in favor of Congressman BLANTON's son. The Congressman denied that this involved any indirect compensation for him.

"My two sons are lawyers", said the Congressman. "They have been Mr. Kirksey's attorneys for many years. They never have received any compensation for their work except this mortgage and they did not represent him in this radio matter."

CONDUCTS EXTENDED HEARINGS

In the summer of 1929 Commissioner Sykes held extended hearings in Florida on the possible rearrangement of two Clearwater stations on different wave lengths. In October the commission announced a series of decisions which involved putting certain stations on 620 kilocycles, a frequency also used by WTMJ, a station at Milwaukee, Wis., owned by the Milwaukee Journal, but the Florida stations put on the frequency were not such as to cause serious interference.

Immediately, however, Florida Congressmen put extreme pressure on Commissioners and a week later without any further hearing the Commission announced a new set of decisions, placing WFLA-WSUN, of Clearwater, on 620 kilocycles in spite of protests filed by the Milwaukee station. The latter appealed to the courts and the Court of Appeals reversed the Commission with instructions to restore WTMJ to its former position so far as interference from Florida was concerned. This was done by providing a directional antenna at Clearwater to shut off interference to the northwest.

PULL AND HAUL ON RADIO BOARD; POLITICS WORKS—YOUNG ROOSEVELT TAKES A HAND IN FIGHT

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 12.—Pressure upon the United States Radio Commission in behalf of this and that broadcasting station is almost continuous, and the pressure is usually political. Provision for licensing of stations of course involves influence, and this is brought to bear on the Commission. The working of the system has been pointed to as an object lesson on what to expect if the Government takes control of all communications systems.

In the case of the application for a license for a broadcasting station at Portland, Maine, the system was exhibited. A multitude of political wires was pulled to control the decision of the Radio Commission. The application was filed on January 3, 1933, by Charles W. Phelan, representing the Shepard Stores, of Boston. The prospective station was to broadcast the programs of the Yankee chain.

PRESIDENT'S SON AIDS

Early in February James Roosevelt, son of the President, who was then broadcasting for the Yankee chain for a consideration, is alleged to have sent a telegram to the Radio Commission asking favorable action on Phelan's application. Apparently quick results followed. On February 10 the Commission granted a permit for the station without holding a hearing.

Young Mr. Roosevelt, who has been reported as quite active in New England politics, has just retired as one of three partners in the insurance business in Boston. Only last Thursday the firm dissolved. "It just did not work as we had hoped", said Douglas Lawson, a partner.

FAVORABLE VOTE AT ONCE

But as to the reported influence exerted by James Roosevelt on the Radio Commission in behalf of the Portland broadcasters: According to two members of the Commission the telegram from young Mr. Roosevelt was read in a meeting of the body and the favorable vote followed immediately. In the telegram, said these Commissioners, Mr. Roosevelt said Phelan was a friend of his and he would appreciate favorable consideration of the application. Two other members said they could not recall the telegram being read, one of them saying that he had never heard of it, the other stating that he understood James Roosevelt had sent such a communication either by letter or wire.

Questioned regarding a report that the telegram had been abstracted from the Commission files when its existence became known, Herbert L. Pettey, secretary of the Commission, said:

"No communication of any kind was ever received from James Roosevelt."

DIRECT REPLY EVADED

I telegraphed James Roosevelt at Boston, asking him whether, while he was broadcasting for the Yankee chain for a consideration, he requested the Radio Commission to act favorably on the application for a broadcasting station at Portland. He wired the following reply:

"In answer your wire proposed Portland, Maine, station had no financial or other connection with Yankee chain for which I broadcast. I understand application for Portland station turned down some time ago and matter closed."

I immediately telegraphed again to Mr. Roosevelt, calling his attention to his failure to say whether he did or did not request the radio station for favorable action on the application and inquiring whether he cared to answer that part of my inquiry.

To this telegram I have received no reply.

GANNETT PAPERS PROTEST

Six days after the Commission granted a license for the Portland station, the Portland Publishing Co., publisher of the Gannett papers in Maine, filed a protest against the action. Similar protests were received from four radio stations located in Portland and Augusta, Maine; Manchester, N.H.; and Toledo, Ohio. All wanted the wave length sought by Phelan. On February 21 the Commission rescinded its action licensing the Phelan station.

Then ensued a period of political wire pulling of several months' duration. Phelan retained as his attorney Paul D. P. Spearman, former assistant general counsel of the Commission, a close personal friend of Secretary Pettey. Gov. Louis J. Brann of Maine and United States Attorney John D. Clifford, both Democrats, went to bat for the Gannett papers. After reconnoitering the situation, Mr. Clifford recommended that the Portland Publishing Co. retain Robert Jackson, who was then Democratic national committeeman for New Hampshire and secretary of the national committee, with the reputation of being the most influential political lawyer in Washington. Mr. Jackson is one of the Democratic national committeemen who resigned from the party organization when President Roosevelt frowned upon the activities of Democratic leaders accepting retainers from clients upon the understanding they possessed access to the back door of the administration.

HEAVY "PULL" PUT AT WORK

Mr. Jackson got busy at once. He knew about the influence James Roosevelt had exerted to procure favorable action on Phelan's application and he was afraid that the pull possessed by a son of the President of the United States would prove a hurdle too difficult for him to surmount. Mr. Jackson finally went to young Mr. Roosevelt and asked him just how far he intended to go in behalf of Phelan. In this conversation Mr. Jackson is understood to have anticipated by several months President Roosevelt's moral stand, which eventually reacted so devastatingly upon himself. Mr. Jackson allowed young Mr. Roosevelt to gather that it was not exactly ethical for highly placed Democrats to be asking favors of Government officials. After this talk Mr. Jackson reported to his clients that young Mr. Roosevelt had telegraphed the Commission merely to oblige his friend Phelan and was not disposed to go further in holding the Commission in line for the Phelan application.

PHELAN FINALLY LOSES

In the summer of 1933 the Commission's engineer reported in favor of granting a license to the Portland Publishing Co. Then the Commission decided to hear the case en banc. All kinds of political pressure was brought to bear on the Commissioner, who eventually last December turned down the Phelan application and granted the facilities to Manchester, N.H. The decision was reached by a 3 to 2 vote, a minority holding out for Phelan, supposedly at the time because of the influence of James Roosevelt.

RADIO CHAINS SEEK STAND-IN AT WHITE HOUSE—THEY FACE PERIL OF BEING CRACKED DOWN ON

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 13.—The significant and often amusing scramble of the great radio broadcasting chains for the "inside track" at the White House and the Radio Commission prophetically illuminates the predicament in which the telegraph and telephone systems, the news agencies, and the newspapers will find themselves if Congress places them under the control of the proposed Government commission.

With the White House dictating decisions of the Radio Commission and "cracking down" on radio interests in disfavor it has become a matter of vital importance for them to "stand in" with the powers that be.

During the Hoover administration it was the National Broadcasting Co., with 15 broadcasting stations, itself a subsidiary of the Radio Corporation of America with several thousand licenses at stake, that enjoyed preferential favor at the White House.

ENCOUNTERS ROUGH GOING

For the last year, under the Roosevelt administration, the Columbia Broadcasting System, with eight broadcasting licenses at stake, has been closer to the throne than its rival has been. Columbia has had little difficulty in getting anything it wanted from the White House and the Commission, while N.B.C. has encountered a lot of rough going.

With all communications under control of a Government commission the wire services, the news-gathering agencies, and the newspapers undoubtedly would be scrambling in like manner for White House favor to promote their interests and avert official "cracking-down." The newspapers particularly would be at the mercy of the power of the White House to direct a censorship of telegraphic news dispatches.

The Columbia Broadcasting System, having been less fortunate than National Broadcasting Co. under the Hoover regime, set out to change its luck when the Roosevelt administration came into power. It placed in charge of its Washington headquarters Henry A. Bellows, vice president of the system, who previously had been in charge of the system's northwestern territory, with headquarters at Minneapolis. Mr. Bellows is a Democrat, a former member of the Radio Commission, and a friend of President Roosevelt, their friendship dating from their youth at Harvard, where Mr. Roosevelt was in the class of 1904 and Mr. Bellows in the class of 1906.

NEVER GOES BEYOND SECRETARY

Mr. Bellows, who is a man of great ability and of the highest character, says he never has presumed upon the friendship to get favors from the White House. He never has gone higher than a Secretary to the President to get what he wanted. As chairman of the legislative committee of the National Association of Broadcasters Mr. Bellows also comes into close contact with the legislative branch of the Government.

The Roosevelt administration was no sooner established in power than Mr. Bellows, on March 18, 1933, announced:

"Assurance of full and complete cooperation has been given directly to the President, to all the members of his Cabinet, and to the leaders of the Senate and House of Representatives. Furthermore, as a matter of public policy during the present emergency, we limit broadcasts of public events and discussions of public questions by ascertaining that such programs are not contrary to the policies of the United States Government."

COLUMBIA HAS INSIDE TRACK

The word soon went forth that Columbia had the inside track at the White House, and it later appeared that equally close relations had been established between the Washington staff of the broadcasting system and officers of the Radio Committee.

At this juncture the National Broadcasting Co. began to betray signs of anxiety. It was bruited about that National Broadcasting Co. was in disfavor because its president, Merlin Hall Aylesworth, not only was a dyed-in-the-wool Republican, but had asserted during the 1932 campaign that if Roosevelt were elected he would leave the country. Of course, this placed Mr. Aylesworth poles asunder from Mr. Bellows, who was an FRBC—For Roosevelt Before Chicago.

The Washington representative of NBC in a personal interview sought to convince the President that Mr. Aylesworth never uttered the damning statement attributed to him. Mr. Roosevelt told the emissary he was sure Mr. Aylesworth never said it, but the President gave the assurance to the accompaniment of a hilarity that did not altogether allay anxiety. Presently, however, NBC made a move calculated to curry favor at the White House. It replaced its Washington news commentator, William Hard, close friend of former President Hoover, with the brother-in-law of one of the President's Secretaries.

HIGH SALARY, LONG-TERM CONTRACT

Columbia has a long record of unusual favors from the Radio Commission, going back several years, but becoming more pronounced since the advent of the Roosevelt administration. Another of its vice presidents is Sam Pickard, a former member of the Commission, who resigned February 1, 1929, and went directly to Columbia at a high salary on a long-term contract.

While Mr. Pickard was a member of the Commission WKRC, a Cincinnati (Ohio) broadcasting station, was able to procure from the Commission an exceedingly favorable wave length, which was transferred from an inferior assignment. It was charged that this was done in violation of all sound engineering considerations, for it immediately caused destructive interference with other stations on the same wave length at St. Louis and Buffalo.

On June 15, 1929, the Commission, without a hearing or a notice to anyone, increased WKRC's hours of operation to unlimited time, and on December 16 increased the power of the station from 500 to 1,000 watts on an experimental basis. The power has never been reduced, although at a subsequent hearing interference was conclusively shown by the stations affected. Mr. Bellows says that since the installation of a directional antenna by WKRC there has been no interference and the protests have been withdrawn. This is disputed by representatives of the complaining stations.

TRANSFER OF OWNERSHIP

In the summer of 1929 there was a formal transfer of the ownership of WKRC to Mr. Pickard and J. S. Boyd, a lawyer who frequently had handled radio cases before the Radio Commission and had been in particularly close contact with Mr. Pickard while the latter was a member of the Commission. It is not known when Messrs. Pickard and Boyd purchased the station or how much they paid for it.

It is known, however, that soon after the Commission granted WKRC the 100-percent increase in power they sold the station to WKRC, Inc., which is virtually a 100-percent subsidiary of the Columbia Broadcasting System. Columbia is said to have paid approximately $300,000 for the interest in the station to Messrs. Pickard and Boyd.

LINKS POLITICS TO DEMOCRATS IN RADIO FIGHT—EVANGELIST DECLARES BOSS GUFFEY INTERPRETED

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 14.—Charges of trafficing in political influence of the Radio Commission cropped out of a hearing last week on an application by Tri-State Radio, Inc., of Washington, Pa., to obtain the wave length of WNBO.

John Brownlee Spriggs, evangelist owner of WNBO, located at Washington, Pa., made formal charges before the Commission that Joseph F. Guffey, Democratic boss of Pennsylvania, had declared himself "in a position to dictate to the Radio Commission." This was in connection with a deal Mr. Spriggs said he made with Guffey to get the Commission's approval of increased power and a change of location for WNBO.

FALLS OUT WITH GUFFEY

Mr. Spriggs said he later fell out with Mr. Guffey whereupon the latter and Special Assistant Attorney General Robert L. Vann sought to get WNBO put off the air and its wave length assigned to Tri-State Radio. Mr. Guffey was subpenaed by the Commission but did not appear. Mr. Spriggs demanded the issuance of a warrant for the Democratic boss. The next day Tri-State withdrew its application for the WNBO wave length and the demand for the presence of Mr. Guffey was waived.

Mr. Spriggs in his formal charge said that at a testimonial dinner for Mr. Vann in Pittsburgh in the summer of 1933 Mr. Guffey and Mr. Vann proposed a deal to get the transfer of site for WNBO in consideration of time on WNBO for political broadcasting.

"Pursuant to the said discussion", said the Spriggs affidavit, "an arrangement was entered into between this affiant and said Robert L. Vann and the said Joseph F. Guffey. The said Joseph F. Guffey then and there represented to your affiant that he was in a position to dictate to the Radio Commission and that he was the distributor of all Federal patronage in the State of Pennsylvania, and that he maintained headquarters permanently in Washington, D.C., and that by reason of his connection with the administration, could accomplish overnight the transfer sought by WNBO. This representation on the part of Mr. Guffey was substantiated, corroborated, and elaborated upon by the Special Assistant Attorney General of the United States, aforementioned.

HANDLE CHANGE OF SITES

"The said Joseph F. Guffey and the said Robert L. Vann stipulated and agreed that 'they would handle' the change of sites for WNBO and increase the power of station WNBO from 100 watts to 1,000 wattage, pay all legal expenses, and all costs of the moving of the apparatus, equipment, etc., which estimate approximated $2,000.

"In consideration of the promises and agreements, representations and considerations of the said Joseph F. Guffey and the said Robert L. Vann as aforementioned, your affiant covenanted and agreed that he would furnish sufficient time of his broadcasting station of a value equivalent to at least $2,000 at the option of the said Joseph F. Guffey and the said Robert L. Vann."

The license of WNBO expired last December and has operated since then on a temporary permit. After Mr. Spriggs and the politicians fell out, Tri-State came into the picture as an applicant for the wave length of WNBO.

DENIES ANY INTEREST IN TRI-STATE

"An investigation disclosed that the attorney of record for Tri-State Radio, Inc., was affiant's lawyer, the aforementioned R. F. Lohnes, and the incorporator and majority stockholder of said Tri-State Radio, Inc., were the very persons named to the affiant by Joseph F. Guffey and Robert L. Vann as the individuals who would accomplish his renewal of license with increased wattage", Mr. Spriggs' affidavit continues.

"Affiant is advised and believes and therefore avers that it is common rumor in Democratic political circles that affiant's license is to be revoked and that the facilities heretofore enjoyed by him are and will be at the disposal of Joseph F. Guffey, Democratic leader of Pennsylvania."

Neither Mr. Guffey nor Mr. Vann is in Washington, but Mr. Guffey's secretary denied that Mr. Guffey is interested in any way in the Tri-State concern.

ELIMINATE POLITICAL ELEMENT

The withdrawal by Tri-State of its application for WNBO's wave length operated to eliminate the political element in the case, but the hearing was continued on Mr. Spriggs' application for a renewal of license for WNBO.

Charges of political influence are involved in numerous other cases coming before the Commission. They were heard in connection with the grant of additional power and unlimited time to WCAH at Columbus, Ohio, although Ohio already exceeds its quota of radio facilities. Also in connection with approval of an application for a new station, WMAS, at Springfield, Mass., which was given without a hearing. Also in connection with a special authorization to WPRO, Providence, R.I., to operate on a better frequency with increased power, although it is far under the recommended mileage separation from other stations on the same wave length. Also in connection with a new station, WLEO, at Erie, Pa., after another station of the same classification, WERE, had been put off the air at Erie.

TEXAS IS OVER STATE'S QUOTA

KTRH operates on 1,120 kilocycles at Houston, Tex., with 500 watts power, sharing time with WTAW at College Station, Tex. KTRH filed an application for 630 kilocycles, full-time operation and power increased to 1 kilowatt in the daytime. Although Texas is over quota, the application was granted on an experimental basis. KTRH is operated by the newspaper owned by Jesse Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

WFI, Philadelphia, was denied an increase of power twice, went through several hearings and appeals and finally resorted to political influence and got the increase without further trouble.

Mr. DICKINSON. If one-half of what Mr. Henning states is true, impeachment would be a mild reward for the conduct of some of the Commissioners. We have impeached judges for far less. What our friends on the other side of the aisle are pleased to call the "air-mail scandals" pale into virtuous dealing beside these charges. We cannot abide that such men should be entrusted with the regulation of the transmission of all intelligence in this country, including broadcasting and the communication of news by telegraph and cable.

I do not know whether or not Mr. Henning has the facts straight. I hope, for the sake of the individuals involved, that he is mistaken. We are certainly put on notice, however, with such charges appearing in the public press. In fact, his are not the only such charges. From time to time intimations of the same sort have appeared in other newspapers, among them the Washington Post.

I am sure we all are interested in seeing to it that the new Commission is nonpartisan, nonpolitical, not merely in form but also in fact. Consequently, I hope some attention can be given to this matter, and that in the end we can have a real investigation of the personnel of this Commission along the line I have heretofore suggested.

I desire to refer, Mr. President, to the question of propaganda. I have before me the Democratic Digest, dated June 1934, no. 6; and on page 13 I see the following:

REPORTER PLAN EXPLAINS THE NEW DEAL—WOMEN IN EVERY PART OF THE COUNTRY STUDY RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION

Any woman who studies the new deal is helping her country. The country will be benefited only by giving the new-deal agencies a chance to succeed. Such a chance can best be got by keeping in power the administration that began the great recovery plan. Thousands of women realize this. They are sending to their party headquarters in precinct and county for information about the recovery plan. When they themselves know accurately the meaning of the different agencies they are ready at once to become missionaries among the uninformed.

New-deal reporters who have studied their present Government say that when Republicans and independents understand the objectives of the recovery administration they respond immediately. They feel that the country for its own good must consider issues, not personalities. Moreover, they are pleased that the reporters take pains to explain to them the administration program.

The people learn from the reporters about the new deal—what it is trying to do, what its activities are, how the country needs it.

Then I turn to pages 10 and 11. Here are the pictures of 15 fine looking women, and I find the following statement:

The new-deal study group of the Federal emergency agencies. Senior reporters—Cuyahoga County, Ohio.

The senior reporters are a group of women from the public affairs committee who have volunteered their services to act as instructors on the Federal emergency agencies.

Each senior reporter is in charge of 22 junior reporters, selected from the wards and suburbs.

They are all excellent speakers and are available for club meetings and social gatherings.

Who are these women? The first one is Mrs. Sam Fitzsimmons, Federal Coordinator of Transportation. I take it she is drawing a Federal salary, and yet she is advertised as one of the ladies who want to go out and give their time and services, when drawing a Federal salary, to spread propaganda in support of the new deal. I do not know how much of her salary she earns here in her position as Federal Coordinator of Transportation.

The next lady is Mrs. Edgar Bowerfind, Federal Alcohol Control Administration. I know nothing about her services and her duties, but I do know, according to this advertisement, that while she is occupying that position she is also available to go out and explain the new deal to the good people who want to listen to her and who want to be sold on the new deal.

The next woman is Mrs. Mary P. Warner, Public Works Administration. Next is Mrs. Edward Carran, National Recovery Administration, National Labor Board. Next is Miss Marie Wing, Consumers' Advisory Board. I had been of the opinion that if the consumers were a little better protected under the N.R.A. the general public would be much better off. I presume Miss Wing is fulfilling her position and doing her work there, but, nevertheless, she is available as a spokesman to go out and spread the gospel of the new deal.

Next is Mrs. Marguerite Reilley, Agricultural Adjustment Administration, Commodity Credit Corporation. It seems she has time, in view of the fact that she is in control of commodity credits, to go out and spread the gospel of the new deal.

Next is Judge Lillian Westropp, Federal Surplus Relief Corporation. Next is Mrs. George Kerr, National Emergency Council. Next is Miss Susan Rebhan, Federal Subsistence Homestead Corporation. She is engaged in the business of finding subsistence homesteads so that people may be taken from the place where they want to be and put at some place where they do not want to be, and may be given a piece of land in order to try to make them contented. It will work out like the old homestead system. When the prairies were being taken up by the homesteaders, there was about 1 family out of 10 that ever stayed and weathered the storm. I suppose that will be true with reference to the Federal Subsistence Homestead Corporation plan.

Next is Mrs. Roy T. Longley, Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. I suggest to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] that this lady belongs to the organization which he helped to create. I presume she is carrying out the functions of her office and performing her duties to earn her Federal salary, and yet she is one of the excellent speakers and is available for club meetings and social gatherings.

Next is Mrs. David Ralph Hertz, Federal Emergency Relief Administration, Civil Works Administration. Next is Mrs. N. B. Harris, Civilian Conservation Corps. She is helping to take care of the boys in the conservation camps.

Next is Mrs. Cora C. Cooley, Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation; and last is Mrs. John Gorman, Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

This is a Democratic club document.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, may I ask if these are appointees of the several Government organizations throughout the United States?

Mr. DICKINSON. Not all of them. They are from various Government bureaus and commissions created under the new deal; some 60 or 70 of them, we believe, but we do not even know how many there are.

Mr. DAVIS. Is the jurisdiction of these women confined to the United States or only to the city of Cleveland?

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, the United States. These women are practically all located in Washington, but they are being sent out as this advertisement states. It simply indicates the agencies which are created in the various organizations covering the United States.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The Senator read something about Cuyahoga County. That is Cleveland. What does that mean?

Mr. DICKINSON. I presume that means an organization of these reporters in the city of Cleveland. These advertisements are being put out stating "if you want to know about the new deal, the Democratic Party, through its personnel in the various bureaus, will send someone to spread the gospel of the new deal and preach it to you, and either convert you or try to close your lips so you will not criticize."

Mr. FESS. That is not a Cleveland publication, is it?

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no. This is a Washington publication, published by the Women's National Democratic Club, 1526 New Hampshire Avenue NW., Washington, D.C.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator from Iowa read the report this morning from the primaries out in Iowa, his State, it would seem he would realize there is no necessity for advertising the new deal out there any more.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me suggest to the Senator from Texas that the Democratic vote in Iowa was below the usual percentage; that we had a greater percentage of votes for Republicans than in the usual primary.

Mr. CONNALLY. I suppose that is because the Senator from Iowa has been doing all the criticizing, then, spending most of his time in spreading political propaganda.

Mr. DICKINSON. If somebody did not help to keep the Democrats straight they would be stealing the gold off the dome of the Capitol. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator's party did not leave any gold on the dome when it went out of office! [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, yes! There is a little of it still left there.

Mr. President, let me proceed just a little bit further. This splendid program of economy on the part of the Democrats, the way they were going to abolish bureaus and do away with useless commissions, is interesting in the light of some information contained in the last report of the Civil Service Commission. Of course the Commission has had to report to us those who are employed in the various bureaus and agencies where a civil-service status is not required.

I find that in the month of April they are still proceeding to add employees. I believe not quite all the Democrats are on the Federal pay roll as yet. Why? I find that the net gain during the month of April was as follows:

Permanent in the District of Columbia, 1,026.
Temporary in the District of Columbia, 1,202.
Permanent outside the District of Columbia, 5,402.
Temporary outside the District of Columbia, 9,073.
Not previously reported, 3,846.

Total net gain for the month of April on the Federal pay roll, 20,549 new personnel!

I find that on March 31 the number was 623,559 while on the 30th day of April it was 644,108. There will be no question about what will happen in the next election if the Democratic Party can get 51 percent of the voters on the Federal pay roll.

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: A few moments ago the Senator from Iowa, in making a political speech, spoke of results in Iowa. I desire to read a short excerpt from the Washington Daily News of today:

NEW DEAL VICTORIOUS IN IOWA PRIMARIES—DEMOCRATS RETURNED—REPUBLICANS FAIL TO UPSET OPPONENTS' HOLD ON STATE THAT THE G.O.P. USED TO CONTROL

DES MOINES, IOWA.—Iowa Democrats saw today in results of the primary yesterday a strong approval of the new deal as mounting returns showed the Democrats had exceeded their strength of 2 years ago by at least 25,000 votes.

Staking their political futures solely on the national recovery issue, only three met opposition in the primary, and all, it appeared, had won renomination. Three were unopposed.

Observers who watched the results of the balloting for political straws in the winds which until 1932 had blown Republicans into office for 48 years, noted that the Democratic Party, despite an almost lethargic campaign and little opposition to State office incumbents, polled an active primary vote, and Gov. Clyde L. Herring received his party's reendorsement for Governor by a 5 to 1 count.

Mr. DICKINSON. I desire to suggest that no comment is made in the newspaper article with reference to the size of the Republican vote in comparison with the Democratic vote. When the percentages are taken they show that the Republican vote is more than normal. I desire to suggest further that there was no contest—that is, no serious contest—so far as the renomination of Governor Herring is concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; there was no serious contest, but the Republicans lost out all along the line.

REVISION OF AIR-MAIL LAWS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3170) to revise the air-mail laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

MONETARY USE AND PURCHASE OF SILVER

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes.

Mr. COUZENS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Johnson	Pope

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce the absences of Senators as previously announced on former roll calls, and for the reasons given, and ask that the announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I simply desire to make an announcement at this time.

The unfinished business was temporarily laid aside earlier in the day in order that the conference report on the air-mail bill might be considered. That report has been disposed of. Tomorrow, by agreement, the calendar will come before the Senate, so that the unfinished business, which is the silver bill, will not come up until 2 o'clock. I desire to give notice that at that time, with the consent of the Senate I shall explain the bill and the difference between the House bill and the Senate bill introduced by me.

That is all the notice I desire to give.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] wishes to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside in order that he may have a bill considered. If it does not require any debate or time I am sure it will be satisfactory to the Senate to take that course.

EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC HIGHWAYS

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8781, to increase employment by authorizing an appropriation to provide for emergency construction of public highways and related projects, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Arizona. There are not many Senators present. It is nearly half past 5. If I were sure the bill would not lead to debate, I should not object; but if there is to be a general debate, I shall object.

Mr. HAYDEN. So far as I am concerned, I expect to make a very brief explanation of the bill. I think I can state its terms to the Senate in a very few words. The bill has been on the calendar for some days. I think it is quite generally understood. If it should lead to any long debate, of course, I should have to withdraw the bill tonight. I should not attempt to hold the Senate in session to pass the bill tonight.

Mr. PITTMAN. In the event the bill should lead to debate, I would have to call for the regular order, the unfinished business.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the calendar is to be considered tomorrow. Does the Senator think we can pass the bill during the calendar hour?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is quite far down on the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. Would the Senator be willing to have his bill follow the call of the calendar? That is, would he be willing to bring up the bill upon the conclusion of the call of the calendar at 2 o'clock?

Mr. HAYDEN. I could not well do that without the consent of the Senator from Nevada, who has given notice that he expects to speak on the silver bill. That is why I should like to have this measure disposed of this evening.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me make a suggestion. I think there was a unanimous report on the bill from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and that it is a measure in which practically every Senator is interested and which most of them favor. I am wondering whether the Senator from Arizona may not explain the bill in just a moment or two.

Mr. McNARY. I am willing to have the Senator from Arizona explain his bill, and then, if there shall be considerable debate, or an indication that there will be, I shall call for the regular order.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is entirely agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the bill as passed by the House of Representatives authorized an appropriation of $400,000,000 as a grant to the States for highway construction, not to be matched in any manner. When the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads came to study the bill and ascertain the facts, it was found that of the previous $400,000,000, appropriated by Congress last year for highways, only $170,000,000 would be expended by the 30th of next June, which would mean a carry-over into the next fiscal year of $230,000,000.

That being the case, the committee decided that it was not necessary at this time to appropriate an additional $400,000,000, which would unbalance the Federal road-building program. Therefore the committee, instead of adopting the proposal of the House of Representatives, recommends the authorization of an appropriation of $200,000,000 as a Federal grant, $100,000,000 of which will be added to the $230,000,000, which will be carried over, making a road program for the next fiscal year of $330,000,000. In the following fiscal year the committee proposes to make an unmatched grant of the second hundred million dollars and authorize Federal aid to the extent of a hundred million dollars, which would mean the appropriation in all of $200,000,000 from the Federal Treasury, to be matched by a hundred million dollars from the States. By so doing there will be a total of $300,000,000 for highway construction for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936.

Then, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, we would be back to the old Federal-aid basis of $100,000,000 appropriated by Congress to be matched by $100,000,000 from the States.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, is provision to be made for the roads in the Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; an amendment provides that part of the money authorized to be appropriated may be used in Alaska, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, what is the basis of allocation?

Mr. HAYDEN. The basis of allocation in the grant of money amounting to $200,000,000 is exactly as was provided in the $400,000,000 allocation made last year. Future allocations are to be on the basis provided in the Federal Aid Act of 1916. It will be remembered that there was a slight accentuation, on the population factor in the grant of $400,000,000, because it was a relief measure. When Congress returns to the old basis of matching Federal aid by the States, then the old and well-established formula of apportionment will be used.

Mr. VANDENBERG. We will still have the accentuation, as I understand it?

Mr. HAYDEN. As to $200,000,000.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator familiar with the action which has been taken in the House of Representatives on the deficiency bill in regard to this matter?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am. The difficulty is that, in order to carry out all the purposes of this bill, legislation is required. Certainly it is preferable for a legislative committee in the House of Representatives and a legislative committee in the Senate to consider and recommend future Federal-aid authorizations than for Congress to attempt to legislate on an appropriation bill, which will have to be done if the pending bill shall not pass.

Mr. HALE. However, as long as the House has legislated in this way, the matter is not subject to a point of order, and we have a right to adopt their legislation.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator has made a correct statement. If the pending bill shall fail of enactment, then the next thing to do is to take the entire text of the bill and insert it as an amendment in the deficiency bill. The Senate has a perfect right to do it either way.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator not satisfied with what the House has inserted in the deficiency bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator from Arizona is not satisfied, because the deficiency bill provides for only $100,000,000 for the year 1936, one-half of which is to be matched by the States. In my opinion, that is withdrawing Federal support, in a period of depression, too rapidly. The program arranged by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is that there will be paid out of the Federal Treasury in the next fiscal year $230,000,000; in 1936, $200,000,000; in 1937, $100,000,000. The committee recommends that Congress gradually go back to the old Federal-aid basis, on the theory that the Nation is slowly getting out of the existing economic depression. But to suddenly drop off unmatched grants of money from the Federal Treasury, as the deficiency bill proposes to do, would involve difficulty among many States.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will not the Senator explain the difference between the legislative provision in the deficiency bill now before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and the bill on which he is seeking action? As I read the legislative provision annexed to the deficiency bill, it provides $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1935. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. BYRNES. It also provides $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937.

Mr. HAYDEN. Or a total program of $300,000,000 spread over 3 years.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads recommends a road program of $400,000,000 spread over 3 years. Otherwise, there will be a $330,000,000 Federal expenditure for highway construction in 1935, then there will be a drop to $100,000,000 in 1936. I am convinced that going off on that rapid basis would lead to demands which Congress would have to meet later.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. On page 10417 of yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I find that Chairman BUCHANAN, of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, has inserted a statement with reference to the funds available for highway purposes, as follows:

Funds available for highway program, fiscal years 1934 and 1935:
Obligated or allocated as of July 1, 1933 (roundly)	$110,000,000
Unobligated, July 1, 1933	15,190,331
Section 204, National Industrial Recovery Act	400,000,000
State contributions to section 204 program	16,162,865
This bill for 1935	100,000,000
Total	641,353,196
Estimated expenditures or Treasury withdrawals:
1934	$275,055,000
1935	300,000,000

It would seem to me that that definitely shows that they think they are arranging for a program of $300,000,000 for next year.

Mr. HAYDEN. The deficiency bill does arrange for a very substantial road-construction program for the next fiscal year; there is no question about it. There is no difference at all between this bill and the deficiency bill as passed by the House of Representatives, so far as the fiscal year 1935 is concerned. The two measures are exactly the same in that particular. But from there on, in order to carry out the idea of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, Congress should not drop down, as the deficiency bill proposes to do, to but $100,000,000 for 1936, of which that bill provides that one-half shall be matched by the States. Under the terms of the deficiency bill there would be a total highway construction program of $330,000,000 for 1935, and only $150,000,000 for 1936.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, is the House program recommended by the President and his relief administration?

Mr. HAYDEN. The President submitted a Budget estimate for an unmatched grant of an additional hundred million dollars for highway construction for the next fiscal year, and that is all the recommendation there is. Both bills conform to that recommendation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is asking the Senate to do more than the President and his relief administrators have asked Congress to do.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; no more and no less; but to do exactly what the President has estimated in his Budget for 1935. However, it is proposed to carry on an adequate road-building program for 1936 and 1937. The legislatures of 44 of the States will meet early in the next year. Congress should let the States know exactly what the Federal Government is going to do in the way of Federal aid in order that they may know what they must do to match the Federal contributions. As I have stated, it is proposed to get back as best we can and as quickly as we can to the old system of matching road money with States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator mean that the President's relief program is silent in respect to subsequent years?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. No Budget estimates for Federal aid beyond 1935 were submitted, but the deficiency bill contains authorizations for 1936 and 1937.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Why is it not all right to remain silent until we reach those years?

Mr. HAYDEN. If we do that, what is the situation we will have to face? Congress will say nothing, and 44 State legislatures will meet next January and February. The legislatures will have no Federal-aid program before them. They will take it for granted that the States can depend upon the Federal Government to provide continuing grants of road money, and they will make no provision to match it. The committee believes it is entirely proper, if we are to go back to the old Federal-aid system, that Congress now give the States due and ample notice by the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with amendments.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment of the committee was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "of", to strike out "$400,000,000 for allocation" and to insert in lieu thereof "$200,000,000, which shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture immediately upon the passage of this act"; on page 2, line 2, after the parenthesis, to strike out the words "in making grants under such section to the highway departments of" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "to"; on line 4, after the word "by", to strike out the word "such" and to insert the words "their highway"; on line 6, to strike out "Provided, That not to exceed 1½ percent of the allotment of this appropriation to any State may be used for surveys and plans of projects for future construction on the Federal-aid system in such State: Provided, That not less than 25 percent of the allotment of this appropriation shall be applied to secondary or feeder roads including farm to market roads and rural free delivery mail roads and public school bus routes" and to insert in lieu thereof "Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall act upon projects submitted to him under his apportionment of this authorization, and his approval of any such project shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of its proportional contribution thereto: Provided further, That not less than 25 percent of the apportionment to any State shall be applied to secondary or feeder roads, including farm to market roads, rural free delivery mail roads, and public-school bus routes, except that the Secretary of Agriculture, upon request and satisfactory showing from the highway department of any State, may fix a less percentage of the apportionment of such State for expenditure on secondary or feeder roads: And provided further"; and on page 3, line 6, after the word "traffic", to insert the following proviso: "And provided further, That the President may also, from the funds made available under this section, make allotments for the construction, repair, and improvement of public highways not to exceed the following sums: In the Virgin Islands $250,000, in Alaska $1,500,000, in Puerto Rico $1,000,000", so as to make the section read:

MONEY, STOCK AND BONDS, DEBTS, AND DEPRESSION

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, money, the medium of exchange, mainly consists of gold, silver, and currency. Gold is no longer circulated as money. It has been withdrawn from private holding and ownership and is locked up in the vaults of the United States Treasury and held as a basis of currency and for settlement of balances abroad. The Gold Act of 1934 vested in the United States Government the custody and control of our stocks of gold as a reserve for our paper currency and as a medium of settling international balances. Likewise, gold certificates have been retired from circulation. Silver long discredited as primary money is sought to be restored in a measure by the pending Dies bill, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, which shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, and redeemable in standard silver dollars, and known as the "Silver Purchase Act of 1934."

This bill after a full hearing was favorably reported from the Ways and Means Committee. The passage of this act in the House brought back memories of 1895, when I attended as a delegate the great silver convention at Memphis, Tenn. An outstanding, dominant figure in that great convention was William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska, who 12 months thereafter, at Chicago, Ill., was nominated for President of the United States as candidate of the Democratic Party. A part of the Democratic platform of 1896 and its main issue was a declaration for bimetallism and to restore silver to free coinage, which reads as follows:

We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1 without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation. We demand that the standard silver dollar shall be a full legal tender equally with gold for all debts, public and private, and we favor such legislation as will prevent for the future the demonetization of any kind of legal-tender money for private contract. We are opposed to the policy and practice of surrendering to the holders of the legal obligations of the United States the option reserved by law to the Government of redeeming such obligations in either silver or gold coin.

The Constitution of the United States gave to Congress the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measure." The pending bill is in the right direction, and its passage will be in the public interest and may lead to the full restoration of silver to its rights under the Constitution. It now circulates as small change, along with copper pennies.

The principal money in circulation is paper currency, needed by all in the transfer of properties and pay for labor, as well as other necessities. A large part of business is transacted through checks, drawn on accounts of deposits in banks.

The vaults of the great banks and trust companies are filled with money hoarded in a large measure for the purchase of untaxed bonds and other securities and such moneys held from other investments. The untaxed securities of all kinds now amount to forty billions—too large a percent of the aggregate wealth of the country freed from taxation. The time has come, in my judgment, to stop the further issue of tax-exempt securities, so that all property of every kind shall pay its fair share of the burdens of Government. The estimated real-estate debt of the United States is put at $43,000,000,000, three times greater than the total railroad debt, four times greater than the total public-utilities debt, four times greater than the industrial long-term debt, and nearly as large as the combined totals of national, State, county, and municipal debt.

Frank C. Walker, Director of the National Emergency Council, has estimated that approximately half of the forty-three billions represented mortgages on homes. So astounding are these figures that Congress has enacted farm loan acts and home loan acts to help in a measure to relieve this condition by Federal loans. In order to relieve the distressed condition of the country, the United States Government has borrowed billions of dollars by the sale of nontaxable bonds and securities to those who have hoarded the money of the United States and who largely own and control the wealth of the country, and these creditors of the Government have accumulated in a large degree their great wealth by the sale and speculation in stocks and bonds, sold to the credulous public at exhorbitant figures, boosted to high levels to fall later to low values. The country was flooded with such stocks and bonds, domestic and foreign, with enormous losses to the purchasers, while those who manipulated these sales fattened with increased wealth, gotten, in a measure, from the purchasers of worthless stocks and bonds, who relied upon the false representations of oft-times irresponsible agents selling these stocks and bonds to innocent and credulous purchasers.

The present depressed condition of the country is largely due to the boosting and sale of worthless stocks and bonds that ended in the crash of October 1929. The Doherty interests reaped millions by the sale of City Service stocks and bonds to the trusting public. The Mellon family are said to have cashed in three hundred millions of profit in May 1929 by the sale of two lines of stocks—Aluminum and Gulf Oil—owned exclusively by the Mellon family.

This condition of an unparalled depression was inherited from 12 years of Republican control of the Government. An awakened public opinion drove the Republican administration from power and gave to the country a new deal and a new responsibility. President Roosevelt and a Democratic Congress have tried to respond by the enactment of helpful legislation in an effort to restore prosperity to our common country. An impressive record has been made. The 1934 revenue bill, reported from the Ways and Means Committee has been enacted into law, seeking to prevent the avoidance of the payment of income taxes by men of great wealth, and remedying other defects in the revenue laws. The same Ways and Means Committee reported the reciprocal tariff bill, seeking to increase foreign trade and the sale abroad of our surplus products of farm and factory, which should increase the price of products of the farm, increase farm values, and thereby farm credits. A further impressive record—Congress passed the Glass-Steagall law, reforming the Federal Reserve and requiring banks to divest investment affiliates and to confine their actions to legitimate banking. It enacted the law guaranteeing bank deposits up to $2,500, restoring in a large degree confidence in banks, lost in a large measure by their failure to discharge their full duty to the confiding public. It passed the Truth in Securities Act and a stock-market control law—the Fletcher-Rayburn Act—by 200 majority in the House and 50 majority in the Senate, a notable response to the unwarranted attack by selfish interests on this measure, enacted to protect the public from the further sale of worthless securities to the credulous public, by which the general public had been robbed and money of the United States taken from circulation to invest in untaxed securities and foreign investment and to escape taxation, making necessary the further sale of bonds to furnish the masses with money to meet their necessities and to employ labor, to feed the hungry and rebuild waste places, so that production could start afresh.

A more definite and highly organized drive and pressure, more widely distributed propaganda, fathered by the hidden hand of Wall Street, was made against effective legislation for Federal supervision of stock exchanges than against any other legislation recommended and desired by President Roosevelt and the country. The stock exchanges on Wall Street and elsewhere did not want their gambling operations to be curbed, through which they unloaded on the public their stocks and bonds and through which they fleeced the many of their hard earnings. What an answer Congress gave to Wall Street and stock gamblers! Wall Street needed a house cleaning. Investment bankers needed a legislative rebuke. The public was entitled to protection from the sale of worthless stocks and bonds through high-powered agencies. It was the answer of the people through their representatives in Congress.

We have needed more money in circulation to take the place of hoarded money held to buy Government bonds and other nontaxable securities. To put additional money in circulation and to pay off Government obligations I favored and voted for the so-called "soldier bonus bill", which passed the House twice with my vote. It was especially needed by those who had borrowed on their certificates at high rates of interest and which compounded would eat up the balance of the certificates at the maturity date. The same influence that induced the sale of billions of United States bonds to those who held hoarded money should have caused payment of the soldier bonus, relieved a distressed condition of the ex-service men, and furnished money to meet the obligations due, pay their debts, help their creditors, and put money in all banks. It is an obligation of the Government that must be paid.

The curse of war still hangs over us. The fear of war still adds to the burdens of all nations in the preparation for possible or probable war. The law of self-preservation is ever present against the greed for more power. Hence nations arm to protect themselves from the aggressions of other nations. Permanent peace will not come unless the peace-loving nations combine to end wars.

The most notable one legacy of the Hoover administration is the proposed cancellation of foreign debts. In 1931 Mr. Hoover suspended the payment of foreign debts, granting a moratorium for a year, prepared the way to abolish reparations due by Germany to France, England, and other countries, which France and other nations agreed to, with the belief or understanding that the United States would consent to a cancellation of the foreign debts or a reduction to mere nominal payments, now called "tokens." Foreign governments are insisting on cancellation or further reduction of said debts, but no such agreement can be carried out without consent of Congress. Congress passed the Johnson resolution demanding payment of all foreign debts, according to the liberal compromise made years ago and forbidding further loans to any nation in default of payment of its debts to the United States. Germany was relieved of payment of reparations, foreign-debt payments to the United States ceased in the main, and the final act is halted by action of Congress. The moving power behind any agreement for cancellation was the billions of foreign obligations for loans by private and corporate capital, mainly from Wall Street, sent abroad for foreign investments. These loans could not apparently be paid unless the United States would consent to cancellation of the foreign debts due her, forgiving, as it were, the first claims due the United States, so as to make possible the payment of the second claims due for private loans abroad. Such apparently was the power behind the throne. United States bonds had been sold to procure the money to lend to foreign countries. The bonds will have to be paid, for they are obligations of the Government of the United States.

If the eleven billions due this country by foreign countries are canceled or not paid, the burden will fall upon the taxpayers of the United States. This $11,000,000,000 debt was to be applied as collected to the reduction of our bonded Government debt. If payments were made, it would help end depression and lessen the need of increased burden of billions to meet an intolerable condition in our country. What a legacy left by the Hoover administration after 12 years of Republican rule. The moratorium and suggested cancellation of foreign debts followed shortly after the visit of a representative of the French Government to the United States, and the agitation for cancellation continued until aroused public sentiment spoke its mind through its Representatives in Congress and the public utterance of the President of the United States. President Roosevelt, speaking the will of Congress and the people, has declared that foreign debts must be paid and our enormous burden of debt thereby relieved. Note his words in his recent message to Congress on June 1, 1934, relating to the foreign debts, when he said:

> The money loaned by the United States Government was in turn borrowed by the United States Government from the people of the United States, and our Government in the absence of payment from foreign governments is compelled to raise the shortage by general taxation of its own people in order to pay off the original Liberty bonds and the later refinancing bonds.

The ever-present power of Wall Street that seeks to control the affairs of our Government is felt in every line of endeavor. With hoarded money it buys the untaxed bonds and securities of the United States and seeks to direct the expenditures of said moneys. It gathers from all sections of the country the moneys earned by the productive energies of the people, and hoards the money to buy the obligations of the Government to meet its urgent needs. What of the future? Let the revelations yet to be made evidence to the country the logical results of agreements made by reason of entangling alliances with foreign countries under the guiding hand of Wall Street and its allied financial interests.

Wide-spread crime, a child of bad conditions, reared its ugly head, which must end. Law enforcement is a cardinal principle of government. Obedience to law should be the desire of every citizen. Violence and crime should end. Protection of life, of liberty, and property should be safeguarded by every agency of government, backed by an assured citizenship everywhere, to the end that law and order shall prevail and that home and country shall be preserved, speedy punishment for the violators of law, so as to increase confidence in our courts and the administration of justice.

A busy Congress is nearing its end. Much needed legislation has been enacted. Congress, in the main, has followed the will of the President and tried to sustain him in his effort to lessen depression and to restore prosperity to our beloved country. The heartbeat of President Roosevelt is for the welfare and contentment of all the people. He is entitled to their confidence and support.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business on tomorrow, Calendar Wednesday, may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to ask that the Committee on Military Affairs may have permission to sit during the session of the House today. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs may be permitted to sit today during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, as I have noted editorial criticism of the President's Gettysburg speech delivered on May 30, I wish to call attention to his speech and especially to that passage of it in which he classes as among the chief hindrances to progress—

> Those who, by declining to follow the rules of the game, seek to gain an unfair advantage over those who live up to the rules, and those few who still, because they never have been willing to take an interest in their fellow Americans, dwell inside of their own narrow spheres.

In its revelation of perspicacity and genuine human sympathy and understanding, I believe that that indictment of selfishness and greed ranks with the immortal pronouncements of Lincoln on that same battlefield at Gettysburg.

I was in Gettysburg on the occasion of President Roosevelt's address, and traveling over the battlefield there came to my mind a comparison between the Gettysburg battle of 1863 and the economic battle of 1934. On the battlefield I noticed various types of artillery and munitions of the period of 1863, and by analogy with the historic conflict of that day, I wish to call attention to the conflict in which we are today engaged.

Thus far we Democrats in power have been using old-deal ammunition to win the battle in which we are engaged. The position assumed by the Republican Party when the depression broke, wherein under Hoover it entrenched itself and waited for prosperity to come around the corner, might be compared to the tactics employed by General Meade. Few victories are won by tactics of defense. The Southern army at Gettysburg with its heroic leader, Gen. Robert E. Lee, might be compared to the Democratic Party under the leadership of our courageous President in the battle of the new deal. Thus far President Roosevelt has demonstrated a fearless, sincere endeavor which is most commendable. However, he is employing old-deal tactics in his efforts to dislodge the enemy and win the victory over depression. Unlike Lee, the peerless general, whom many historians justly acclaim as the greatest military leader of modern times, our President, as yet, has failed to attack the entire line. Lee, with determination and a knowledge of military art and strategy, finding the enemy entrenched on Cemetery Ridge and Little Roundtop, on the third day struck at the most vulnerable point, recognizing as he did that victory on the Federal center would spell dismal defeat for the army of Meade.

The new-deal assaults on the flanks of the depression have been partial and, at the most, can only be temporarily effective. Fifty percent of the ammunition used by the new deal in combat is composed of the milk of human understanding and sympathy in the heroic efforts which are being made to extend relief to the unemployed. The other half of the new-deal ammunition is impregnated with the saltpeter of tax-exempt securities, with the result that every shell which is thrown into the enemy lines in the new-deal assault only adds to the difficulty and burdens of taxation which the people must ultimately confront. Every dollar we are spending through this medium to grant merited aid and succor to the unemployed, to the youth and aged of our land, under the coupon clipper's doctrine must be returned two for one within a period of 16 to 17 years, thus making a mockery of relief to the people through this method.

Our leader, President Roosevelt, apparently does not have enough strategists representing the common people on his general staff. Never in history has any individual in time of peace so completely held the loyalty and support of his people as does our President, and for that reason he could and should proceed to attack the enemy at its most vulnerable point—that is, the center or heart of the line, which is nothing other than the international and Wall Street banking ring and the Federal Reserve System.

It is reported that General Longstreet in discussing the impending charge by the brave men of the Confederacy under General Pickett actually shed tears as the order was given to move forward, conscious as he was that the movement was fraught with every possibility of defeat. Members of Congress, while not shedding tears, find their hearts bleeding in sympathy with our distressed citizens as they also recognize that the efforts thus far expended are only of a partial or temporary nature, and that nothing can conquer the depression permanently except the use of modern artillery which is available to our President through the nationalization of banking and the extension of credit direct to the citizen at cost, or at the very lowest rate of interest.

The combat of Lee was conducted in enemy territory, with reinforcements virtually impossible, which compelled him and his brave followers to fight with a determination seldom if ever witnessed in battle. Unlike Lee, our President has the support of the people of the entire United States. They are following him devotedly, and are hoping that he will call up the reserves and that he will not diminish in his efforts until the rights guaranteed to the people under the Constitution are restored to them and the power of Congress to coin money and control the credit of our Nation is effectively exercised and forever taken from the small, selfish group of financiers who, as indicated in the President's Gettysburg address, may be considered as—

> Those who, by declining to follow the rules of the game, seek to gain an unfair advantage over those who live up to the rules, and those few who still, because they never have been willing to take an interest in their fellow Americans, dwell inside of their own narrow spheres.

The memory of General Lee has been signally honored recently by the Government's acceptance of a statue of him presented by the State of Virginia in recognition of his heroic efforts and accomplishments in both military and civil pursuits.

Thus far President Roosevelt has shown qualities of the Lee standard, and I have taken the floor this afternoon to impress upon my colleagues, if I can, the danger of adjourning Congress until we have accomplished something of a really constructive nature, such as would be gained by what I have described as a frontal attack on the entrenched banking and financial hierarchy. We were called upon yesterday to vote, under a gag rule, on a bill which appropriates billions through the medium of tax-exempt securities, and the Members of the House were not given an opportunity of amending or even discussing the measure. The President is given the widest latitude in expending these funds, which would indicate the impotence of Congress to determine how public moneys should be expended in the interest of our distressed unfortunate unemployed in whom I know that most of my colleagues are, like myself, especially interested.

Individuals in my district who worked devotedly and who are yet 100 percent loyal to the new deal have not been reemployed, although some of them perhaps have received partial C.W.A. relief, a relief deplored by honest men as they plead for legislation which will grant them an opportunity to obtain employment and earn their livelihood in the fullest respect and honor.

The Congress, in a sense, is the general staff in the army of President Roosevelt, and as such, should exercise every facility and power at its command to advise and guide the President in attacking the center of our depression by annihilating the corrupt power of entrenched wealth which I believe he visualized in his Gettysburg speech. The President and our party will never destroy this insidious power until we reclaim our constitutional rights and coin money and regulate the value thereof.

It is noted that Raymond Moley, the first apostle in the new deal, speaking editorially in the May issue of Today, states:

> With the passage of the stock exchange bill, the new deal is practically complete.

I cannot believe that the President subscribes to this theory of the prince of theorists, for in his recent book he expresses his conviction that we are on our way, indicating that he is looking forward to substantial benefits yet to be obtained for the people, rather than to an arrest of activities, as is indicated by Moley.

The American people have been on short rations for many years, and they are to be commended for their admirable qualities of loyalty and patriotism during this period. Increasing reports, however, from every section of the country indicate that patience is not far from the breaking point, and it is in the interest of our country and its people, rather than in the interest of the political future of any of my colleagues or myself, that I reiterate my hope that Congress will not adjourn until we have enacted legislation which will bring permanent relief to our distressed citizens and effectively remove the menace of Communism, disorder, and distress which is overshadowing our entire Nation.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

On motion by Mr. BYRNS, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the special committee on the subject of un-American activities is holding hearings today, and probably none of them are on the floor for this reason. They are engaged officially in hearings. The committee consists of the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. McCORMACK; the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. JENKINS; the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. TAYLOR; the gentleman from New York, Mr. DICKSTEIN; the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. GUYER; the gentleman from California, Mr. KRAMER; and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. WEIDEMAN. If any of these gentlemen have not answered to their names, the RECORD should show it is due to the fact they are engaged in these hearings.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is engaged in a hearing, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. RAYBURN, being chairman. The members of this committee who have not answered to their names should be excused from answering the roll call.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the majority leader tell us what the program is going to be and what bills it is expected to call up?

Mr. BYRNS. I cannot answer the gentleman specifically. The Speaker has certain suspensions which he has agreed to recognize.

Mr. SNELL. Would it be fair for the Speaker to tell us what the suspensions are?

The SPEAKER. I will submit a list of them.

Mr. BYRNS. May I say to the gentleman that it is very important that the House take action on the bill authorizing the District Commissioners to apply for a loan from the P.W.A., and I think this bill will be called up under a rule at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SNELL. May I ask that the list of suspensions be read, because everyone on this side is making inquiry as to what bills are coming up?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the list of suspensions. There will be others.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, the Speaker is not hog-tied to that list in any way?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. There will be others.

Mr. SNELL. The Speaker said there would be others. This is just a tentative list, so we will know something about the matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

SPEAKER'S SUSPENSION LIST CORRECTED TO JUNE 5, 1934

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may have permission to sit during sessions of the House for the remainder of the session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS. In order that there may be no misunderstanding on the part of anyone, was it the intention of the Chair to state that he was going to recognize motions to suspend the rules in respect of these bills in the order listed?

The SPEAKER. They will not be called up in that order.

Mr. BYRNS. I wanted that understood.

GEORGE A. FOX

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3586) for the relief of George A. Fox.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint George A. Fox, chief pharmacist's mate, United States Navy, a chief pharmacist in the Navy, subject to qualification on physical examination, with the pay and allowances provided by law for chief warrant officers after 20 years' commissioned service and with creditable record: Provided, That no back pay, allowances, or emoluments shall become due prior to the date of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is there about this bill, which is a private bill, that makes it so important that it should be taken up before all the other measures on the calendar?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I may state to the gentleman from Texas that this enlisted man since 1920 has been serving at the White House. He waited on President Wilson, President Harding, President——

Mr. BLANTON. Objection withdrawn; that is reason sufficient.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BILLS REPORTED BY COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 1 minute to make a preliminary statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary desires to submit to the judgment of the House a number of bills, hoping that many, or possibly all, may go through by unanimous consent. This would save the necessity of asking for a suspension of the rules.

COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 9437) to amend an act of Congress approved February 9, 1893, entitled "An act to establish a Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice this bill is on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is it the gentleman's purpose to take up now the bills from the Judiciary Committee that are on the Consent Calendar?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. That is, the more important ones. This bill is important, in a sense, and was submitted to the House once before on the call of the Consent Calendar. May I make this explanation about it?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wanted to ask the gentleman to explain the bill, and I may say to the gentleman that we who work on the Consent Calendar have the bills in some order and it puts us to a great deal of inconvenience to try to catch these bills as they are called up if they are not called up in the regular order on the Consent Calendar. I just happened to recall that this bill is on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I say to the gentleman that this particular bill has been on the Consent Calendar and the gentleman has worked this bill over.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I supposed we were going to take this up in order when we got to the Consent Calendar. Of course, the Speaker has the right to recognize anyone he wants.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Let this go by unanimous consent.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me rather peculiar that you are going to take up a lot of Private Calendar bills when we met here at 11 o'clock to consider the Consent Calendar. I have no objection to the bill, but it seems to me we ought to have some plan as to how we are going to proceed with this calendar; otherwise, we might just as well say we are going to put the entire calendar through and not pay any attention to it. I am not going to object to this bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. You have had this bill before you before.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before the objection stage is passed, I want to ask some questions about it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. When the Court of Appeals for Washington was first created it was called the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. And this, in a way, limited its scope both as to appointment of judges and otherwise. Now, it is attempted by this measure to enlarge the scope of the court by making it a court of appeals of the United States comparable with the other courts of appeal. Is not that right?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I say to my friend——

Mr. BLANTON. Is not that right?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not exactly; but almost.

Mr. BLANTON. It is almost right. Tell us wherein it is not all right.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Let me make a statement. The fact is that Congress by an accumulation of national jurisdiction that has been given to this court has, in fact, created it a court of appeals. Very much more than a majority of its business is national business.

Mr. BLANTON. This is to put it on a comparable basis and scope with the other courts of appeal of the United States.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. Does it enlarge in any way the salaries of the judges?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Nor the salary of any subsequent judge?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It does not.

Mr. BLANTON. It has developed within the last few days, in the deficiency bill that we passed, that because the judges in the District refused to accept the 15 percent cut, which everybody else has accepted except the judges, there was a deficiency in their appropriation, and it was necessary to carry a large appropriation to cover that deficiency. Is my colleague in favor of the judges' being the only employees of the United States who have not accepted the cut, is the gentleman in favor of the attitude of these judges in refusing to accept their cut?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am not.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of taking the step requiring them to step up like men and take their cut with other people.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. You will have to amend the Constitution to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. Let them be men enough to do it without amending the Constitution, like the President of the United States does. If they want to retain the respect of the people let them take the same cut in salary all other officials have sustained.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Has the gentleman given any thought to the difficulty that might arise by changing the name of the court—difficulties in pending litigation?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not at all. I do not think there would be difficulties.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Is there liable to be any question about procedure?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No. This would make possible the decisions of the court to rank with the decisions of other courts of appeals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the court established by the act of February 9, 1893 (27 Stat. 434), entitled "An act to establish a Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", shall hereafter be known as the "United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 3041.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object to any other bills coming up out of the regular order.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I suggest to gentlemen on both sides of the House that we are going to attempt to call up on the first opportunity S. 3041, which is known as the "kick-back" bill, preventing contractors from compelling workmen to return a part of their salaries. I would like to have gentlemen who are interested make an examination of that bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That bill is on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We are going to try to get it up the first opportunity, any way we can. I know everybody wants to get these bills through.

Mr. BYRNS. How many bills has the gentleman that he expects to call up? We are going to have the Unanimous Consent Calendar here tomorrow, and I am doing everything I can to bring about a call of the Private Calendar. The gentleman, with his committee, is undertaking to get in ahead of the other committees.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. All the boss has to say to me is, "We don't like to have it done", and he does not have to make a speech about it—I will quit.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not going to object to a single one of the bills, but I think it is rather out of order.

Mr. SNELL. We do not want to have any more private bills come up out of order.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not want to encourage a filibuster by the leaders here, Mr. Speaker, and so I am just quitting.

CENSUS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 9391) to provide for a census of unemployment, employment, and occupations to be taken as of November 12, 1934, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 9391, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to provide information concerning the numbers, classes, and geographical distributions of unemployed persons and their dependents, and concerning employment and occupations, necessary to aid in the formulation of a program of unemployment relief, the Director of the Census shall take as of November 12, 1934, a census of unemployment, employment, and occupations in the 48 States and the District of Columbia: Provided, That such census may include such enumeration of population as the Director of the Census may deem appropriate and necessary for the purpose of this section.

SEC. 2. The provisions, including penalties, of the act providing for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved June 18, 1929 (46 Stat. 21; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 13, ch. 4), shall, so far as not inapplicable, apply to the taking of the census provided for in section 1 of this act. In applying such provisions the period from the date of enactment of this act until the completion of such census, and all reports and publications relating thereto, shall be deemed to be a decennial census period. Temporary personnel in the District of Columbia, employed to carry out the provisions of this act, may be allowed leave of absence with pay at the rate of 1¼ days per month.

SEC. 3. The census of agriculture and livestock, authorized to be taken as of January 1, 1935, by section 16 of the said act of June 18, 1929, and appropriated for in the Department of Commerce Appropriation Act, 1935, shall be taken as of November 12, 1934, conjointly with, and covering the same geographical limits as, the census provided for in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 4. To meet the expenses of section 1 of this act the President is authorized to make available not to exceed $7,540,000 from the fund appropriated by the act entitled "An act making an additional appropriation to carry out the purposes of the Federal Emergency Relief Act of 1933, for continuation of the Civil Works program, and for other purposes", approved February 15, 1934. Amounts so made available shall remain available until expended.

SEC. 5. The President is authorized, from the fund appropriated by such act of February 15, 1934, to make available to the Secretary of Commerce not to exceed $368,465 for the printing of reports collected and now being compiled, on the census of American business, census record preservation, urban tax delinquency, and real property inventory. Amounts so made available shall remain available until expended.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman on the committee?

Mr. KINZER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. KINZER. I am.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 9391 comes from the Committee on the Census with the unanimous recommendation, with the exception of 1 vote, the minority members reserving the right, in reporting the bill, to oppose the measure if they saw fit and proper so to do. The existing law provides for an agricultural census to be taken as of January 1, 1935, the cost of which has been provided for by the Department of Commerce Appropriation Act for the year 1935. The estimated cost of the agricultural census is $2,700,000, and the last Department of Commerce appropriation bill carried an appropriation of that sum to cover the taking of the agricultural census. This bill advances the date of taking the agricultural census from January 1 to November 12, but carries no additional appropriation for the taking of the agricultural census.

The pending bill provides for the taking of an unemployment, employment, occupations, and a limited population census. By "limited population census" I do not mean that all the people in continental United States will not be enumerated, because under this act there will be a complete enumeration of the population, but the schedules incident to the taking of a population census will be materially reduced. So, as a matter of fact, the pending bill provides for a complete population census, an agricultural census, an unemployment census, an employment census, and an occupations census.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Not now. May I say that the necessity for taking this census has been established by very complete and comprehensive hearings. The American people are not yet out of the woods. Emergency conditions continue. The pall of depression which was the result of 12 years of maladministration of our national affairs has not yet been lifted, and the unemployment problem has not yet been solved. Unless we can solve the unemployment problem, unless these idle millions can be put to work, there can be no return of prosperity. There has been such a tremendous shift in population from the industrial and commercial centers to the agricultural areas that no one can form an accurate impression or judgment as to the number and whereabouts of the unemployed in the United States. According to the Alexander Hamilton Institute, there are at the present time 13,000,000 people in the United States who are unemployed. The National Industrial Conference Board estimates the number of unemployed at 8,000,000, a difference of 5,000,000, or 40 percent between the estimates of unemployment by these two reliable organizations. The American Federation of Labor estimates the unemployment at 11,000,000. So we find that the statistical organizations, the Department of Commerce, the Bureau of the Census, the Department of Labor, and other departments and organizations whose statistics are considered reliable by the industrial and commercial interests of the Nation, are completely at sea and widely differ as to the extent of our unemployment. No one will claim that there can be a successful consummation of our recovery program unless we first take an inventory of our natural resources, of our man power, of the number of unemployed, the number of employed, and the number in the various occupations in the United States. We are today as a nation dangerously close, as we have been for years, to a pit so deep that if we fall into it we will have to look up to see the bottom. The United States Steel Corporation, the Standard Oil Co.—any great business corporation or organization finding itself involved in financial difficulty, facing economic chaos, would hasten to take an inventory of its assets, liabilities, and resources in order that it might plan a recovery program. The Census Bureau makes no guesses as to population, it makes no guesses as to employment or unemployment, it makes no guesses as to the whereabouts of these men who have drifted from the industrial districts and from the great centers of wealth and population and in what occupations, if any, they are now employed.

There is not a single vocational group, whether it be labor, industry, agriculture, transportation, or big business, that is not vitally interested in having a correct census of unemployment, employment, occupations, and population, to the end that the recovery program may be prosecuted intelligently. I say to my colleagues that we have here a proposition that in my opinion and in the opinion of those who have studied the situation from an industrial and commercial standpoint, which in the prosecution of the administration's recovery program will save two or three times the amount of money this census will cost.

In the expenditure of the billions of dollars that this Congress and other Congresses have appropriated, this census is of vital importance, and in fact necessary. The emergency agencies of the Government cannot proceed intelligently with their recovery programs unless they have the information this census will supply. This census is favored by Secretaries Ickes, Roper, Wallace, and Perkins; by Mr. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator; and Hugh S. Johnson, National Recovery Administrator. All these officials say this census is needed and necessary. All say it will tremendously aid the recovery program; that without this census they are striking in the dark.

If there ever were a time in which the taking of a census was justified, that time is now.

All standard statistical organizations approve this measure, as does every officer of the Government dealing with problems evaluating our economic life.

The $2,700,000 cost of the agricultural census has already been appropriated. It is estimated that the cost of taking the occupation, employment, unemployment, and population census will be $7,540,000. This bill does not call for the appropriation of any additional funds. It makes available $7,540,000 out of the fund Congress has heretofore appropriated for the Civil Works Administration under the supervision of Mr. Hopkins. So the total new cost of this project will be $7,540,000, the cost of which will be paid out of funds heretofore allocated to the President and made available to Mr. Hopkins in consummation of the C.W.A. program.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HESS].

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, in 1930 the Congress authorized the Census Bureau to take the Fifteenth Decennial Census. It was the most complete census ever taken by this country or any other country, at a cost of $40,000,000. It covered unemployment, employment, occupation, population, and various other items. That census was completed about 6 months ago, and the final reports were issued at that time. We are now asked, within a period of less than 4 years from the taking of that census, to expend the sum of $7,540,000 additional to take a census of unemployment, which was taken in 1930, a census of employment which was taken at that time, a census of occupation which was taken at that time, and we are asked to take this census on the 12th day of November, just a few days after the coming elections. I wonder what the reason for that is?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HESS. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is it not true they have just completed a census of population taken by the C.W.A.?

Mr. HESS. The C.W.A. has been taking a census of population of all the large centers of the country. Just recently it was completed in the city of Chicago, showing that the population has decreased about 100,000. It is being carried on in all of the large centers of the country today. There is absolutely no necessity for the taking of a census of unemployment at this time. It is simply the expenditure of $7,500,000 to give jobs to 110,000 deserving Democrats. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HESS. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Under the departments of labor of the various States, we have now been trying to take a census of unemployed, and have that data at hand, the same as this census would give, without the expenditure of the $7,000,000.

Mr. HESS. The Department of Labor is taking a census of the unemployed continuously. The C.W.A. is taking a census throughout the country. The American Federation of Labor keeps a census of unemployment up to date, from month to month. There is absolutely no need for this census.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HESS. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. This administration started out to reduce Federal service, and there are now on the Federal pay roll 40,000 more people than there were when this administration began.

Mr. HESS. That is correct. There are 60,000 more. Let us see where the demand came from for the taking of this census. There was not one witness appeared before the committee representing either labor or the employers of the United States. They are not asking for this census. They know there is unemployment existing in this country, and they are trying to correct it. That is what we should be doing, instead of spending this money foolishly; but the demand has come from the Census Bureau, the Department of Labor, a lot of social scientists, the American Statistical Association, the American Sociological Society, and insurance actuaries. We had about 97 letters presented to the committee by one of the witnesses.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HESS. No; not at this time.

Those letters were from college professors at Cornell, Michigan, South Dakota, Columbia Universities, University of Minnesota, University of Cincinnati, Miami University, and others. Dr. Rice, who is Assistant Administrator of the Census Bureau, testified in answer to a question by Mr. KINZER:

I should say it is a rather spontaneous recognition by social scientists of the types I have mentioned that the population data of 1930 were no longer adequate to give us the information that is required. I think I can assure the committee that they were not inspired by the Department or the Bureau.

Then he goes on further to say that at his suggestion these 97 letters were written to the Department suggesting the taking of this census. We are told that the Census Bureau had asked for a census; that the Department of Labor had asked for a census; that the Federal Administrator of Emergency Relief had asked for a census; also that the Public Health Service had asked for the taking of a census, so as to show the birth rate and the death rate throughout the country since the taking of the 1930 census.

Mr. Speaker, the various boards of health throughout the State furnish annually to the Public Health Service the death and birth rates of the various municipalities, counties, and States. The C.W.A. and the employment agencies of the Department of Labor furnish data as to employment to the P.W.A., the Department of Labor and other Government agencies.

We know too well that there is an unemployment problem existent today and that between eight and ten millions of our citizens are out of work. How are we going to put them back to work? Not by the passage of bills such as this one. All this bill will do is give 2 to 6 weeks' employment to 100,000 deserving Democrats, at an expenditure of about $10,000,000 under the guise of a census bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BEAM). The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HESS] has expired.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN].

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, before there can be lasting recovery from the depression, we must find a solution for certain fundamental problems. One of these problems with which we must deal in a fundamental way, and which we must solve, is that of unemployment.

NO ACCURATE INFORMATION REGARDING UNEMPLOYMENT AVAILABLE IN THE UNITED STATES

It may sound strange, but it is true, that we have no accurate or even fairly accurate information regarding the number of unemployed in the United States. We do have fairly accurate figures of the actual employment in the various manufacturing and other industries in the United States, but we do not have any dependable figures on unemployment.

Accurate information regarding unemployment is necessary, because without it we cannot intelligently and economically solve the problem of unemployment.

The United States Department of Labor receives every month accurate figures showing the number of persons employed in the manufacturing industries of the United States. On the basis of these figures the Department of Labor then makes its monthly estimate of the number of persons employed, but there is no way open to the Department of Labor or to any other Government department which would permit an estimate of the number of unemployed.

Various private estimates of the number of unemployed have been made. For instance, in a recent statement the National Industrial Conference Board estimates the number of unemployed to be in excess of 8,000,000; the American Federation of Labor has placed that number as somewhere around 11,000,000; and the Alexander Hamilton Institute has estimated that the unemployed are in excess of 13,000,000.

Here you have three recent estimates varying from 8,000,000 unemployed to 13,000,000, a variation of about 40 percent.

All of these estimates, however, are hardly more than guesses. Not one of them can lay claim to accuracy. These figures regarding the extent of unemployment are not based upon reliable information, and therefore they cannot be the basis of careful planning and a prudent solution of the unemployment problem.

THE NUMBER, OCCUPATION, AND DISTRIBUTION OF THE UNEMPLOYED IS UNKNOWN

We know, of course, that we have millions of unemployed in the United States. We know that from our daily experience. We know it from the fact that about 18,000,000 people, including adults, children, and aged are receiving public relief. But we do not know their exact number. We do not know the ages and occupation of the unemployed. We do not know where they are.

We should know how many unemployed we have, and how many of those who are unemployed are employable. We should know the occupations of the unemployed—whether they are carpenters, bricklayers, steel workers, shipbuilders, clerks, office workers, shop workers, and so forth. We should know if they recently graduated from high school or college, whether they are young people or of middle age. We should know where the unemployed are located, in what State, in what county, or in what cities.

THE CENSUS IS ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY FOR THE INTELLIGENT AND ECONOMIC EXPENDITURE OF RELIEF FUNDS

I say without hesitation that without a census on unemployment, employment, and occupation, as is proposed here, we cannot intelligently deal with the problem of unemployment. Without such a census we cannot adequately and prudently judge the extent to which direct unemployment relief is necessary. Without such a census we cannot have an intelligent administration of the relief laws, nor can we properly distribute and allocate Public Works funds. Without such a census vocation guidance is a farce.

Let me repeat, that without the proposed census we cannot adequately take care of the present, nor can we intelligently or prudently plan for the future.

The census is at the bottom of the problem of unemployment and of relief. There is no use appropriating millions and indeed billions of dollars for unemployment relief whether by direct relief or by public works unless we have the data to use that money intelligently for the benefit of the unemployed. Such data can be provided only by the proposed census.

THE CENSUS IS NECESSARY TO DETERMINE THE MANNER OF EXPENDING PUBLIC WORKS FUNDS

The Congress last year appropriated $3,300,000,000 for public works—Federal, State, and municipal. The applications filed with the Public Works Administration in Washington far exceed that amount. It therefore was necessary for the Public Works Administration to choose between the various applications.

The question presented was, What projects should be approved in preference to others? An intelligent decision could not be made by the Public Works Administrator without accurate information as to the number of unemployed, as to their location, and as to their occupation.

For instance, if among the unemployed, steel workers predominate, quite evidently projects should be approved which consume a great deal of steel. But if building-trades craftsmen predominate among the unemployed, such projects should be preferred which employ the largest number of building-trades people. Further, if Pennsylvania has a larger number of unemployed in proportion to its population, than, for instance, the State of California, then projects submitted by Pennsylvania should be acted upon in preference to those submitted by California.

These are only instances to show that the public-works funds cannot intelligently be expended without accurate information on unemployment.

The House of Representatives yesterday voted an additional fund of $500,000,000 for public works. These additional public-works funds cannot be wisely and most effectively expended unless the proposed census will tell us the occupation and the location of the unemployed, so that the Public Works Administration can determine which projects, which industries, and which localities should be preferred.

THE N.R.A. NEEDS THE CENSUS DATA IN FIXING HOURS OF LABOR IN THE CODES

The N.R.A. has approved about 450 codes. It is considering several hundred more. Each code involves a solution of the question of how many hours the persons employed in that industry shall work each day and how many days each week. In order to determine this intelligently, the code administrator in Washington should have for each industry the number of employed and the number of unemployed. He could then say to the industry: You are responsible for so many hundreds of thousands of people. Therefore you arrange the hours of labor so that your industry will reemploy a larger number of its people.

But this information is not available, and it will not be available until a census on unemployment and occupation is held.

Another question which is raised by the N.R.A. is, How many people have been employed through the codes? That again cannot be answered unless we have a census on unemployment.

THE CENSUS DATA FURNISH A NECESSARY GUIDE FOR VOCATIONAL TRAINING

A very important employment problem is that of vocational training. Every year hundreds of thousands of our young people graduate from high schools and colleges. They are faced with the question of what occupations and trades they should prepare for.

The question cannot be answered unless a census of unemployment and occupation is taken. That census will show what industries and trades have the largest number of unemployed. With these data available these young people could be told not to prepare themselves for such an occupation, because there would be very little chance for employment.

For instance, they could be told not to become coal miners because there are too many coal miners and their chances for employment would be small.

The data on unemployment and occupation are essential for guiding our young people in questions of vocational training.

THE ELLENBOGEN BILLS FOR A CENSUS ON UNEMPLOYMENT, EMPLOYMENT, AND OCCUPATION

For these and various other reasons I have steadily urged the Congress to authorize a census on unemployment, on employment, and occupation, to be held in November 1934 by the United States Bureau of the Census.

On January 17, 1934, 2 weeks after the convening of this session of Congress, I introduced House Joint Resolution No. 234 providing for an unemployment survey. On February 7, 1934, I introduced a bill (H.R. 7765) to provide for a population, unemployment, and agricultural census to be taken as of November 12, 1934, and on March 2, 1934, I reintroduced the same bill in simplified and modified form. This last bill, H.R. 8436, provides for a census of unemployment, employment, and occupation.

During all this time I was in constant communication with the Department of Labor, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, and the Bureau of the Census, and with other Federal officials who were concerned or interested in the proposed census. Several conferences were held in my office. Finally I was able to obtain the united endorsement of my census plan by the entire administration in Washington.

Beginning Monday, April 30, the Census Committee of the House of Representatives, of which I am a member, began its hearings. It considered my plan for the holding of a census on unemployment, employment, and occupation on November 12, 1934.

After hearings the Committee on the Census reported the bill now before the House of Representatives. This bill, in all important and fundamental respects, is the same as that which I introduced.

A CENSUS ON POPULATION WILL BE TAKEN AT THE SAME TIME

A census on unemployment would not be very useful unless at the same time a population census was taken so that we may know the number of unemployed in proportion to to the number of employed, and in proportion to the whole population.

The last population census was held in 1930. Since then there have been great shifts in our population. People have left the cities and have returned to the country. So great has been the drift of our own population, as between city and country that the statistics of the 1930 census are no longer dependable as a basis for compiling mortality and birth rates. They are no longer dependable as a basis for statistical information which is required for various activities of the Government.

It is estimated that several million people have left the cities and have returned to the farms. This population movement has had important consequences.

First. It has still further disturbed the balance between agricultural and industrial production.

Second. The fact that many persons have left the cities has contributed to the decline of the value of real estate in the cities.

Third. This in turn has affected the ability of the owners of real estate in the cities to pay taxes and has greatly reduced the proportion of taxes collected.

Fourth. The reduction of the amount of taxes collected has affected the operation of local units of government, which in turn has placed the responsibility of caring for the unemployed upon the Federal Government.

Now, I should like to answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HESS], who has spoken before me. In one breath the gentleman says that this bill is merely politics. In the next he says that this bill has been brought before the Congress at the demand of college professors.

Now, I ask, does the gentleman charge college professors from universities all over the country—from Pennsylvania, Johns Hopkins, Yale, Cornell, Columbia, California, Chicago, Michigan, Wisconsin, and from many other colleges—does he charge them with playing politics?

Mr. HESS. Yes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Just a moment. The gentleman did not yield to me; I cannot yield to him.

Mr. HESS. But the gentleman asked me a question.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. And I shall be glad to have him answer it.

Mr. HESS. Permit me to say that the college professors asking for these statistics are all theorists and want these statistics for no purpose whatsoever than to give them new material to present to their classes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. But it must be clear to everyone that these eminent university professors have no political motive in mind in asking for this census.

The gentleman also stated that industry did not ask for this census. The gentleman is mistaken. The National Industrial Conference Board and the American Federation of Labor both asked for it.

Mr. HESS. Did the American Federation of Labor send a representative to appear before the committee?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. It sent a communication to the committee, approving the census.

Mr. HESS. I have seen no communications from them with respect to this bill.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Lozier, the chairman of the committee has the communication from the American Federation of Labor.

THE DATE OF THE CENSUS

The gentleman wants to know how the date of the census was fixed. I shall be glad to tell the gentleman.

By the Fifteenth Decennial Census Act, dated June 18, 1929, it was provided that an agricultural census should be held every 5 years. Under the terms of that act of 1929 the next agricultural census would be held on January 1, 1935.

It is the opinion of the Department of Agriculture and of the Bureau of the Census that the date of the agricultural census should be changed to November 15, 1934, so that reports may be received at the end of the crop year, before the removal of large parts of tenants to new farms.

Now, instead of taking November 15, 1934, as the census date, we took November 12, because that happens to be on a Monday and the census should start at the beginning of the week.

Another reason why November 12, 1934, was set as the date for the taking of the census is, because the information to be derived from the census is absolutely required for the solution of the unemployment problem. It is required, so that we may adequately provide for unemployment relief at the time when unemployment is at its peak—which is generally in December and January.

We must have the unemployment figures available next December and January. We cannot have them at that time unless the census is held in November. These figures will be of inestimable value in guiding the President and the Federal Relief Administration in taking care of the army of unemployed, which will probably be much larger at that time than any other time during the year.

Another reason for fixing November as the time for the taking of the census is that a census on unemployment should not be taken at the peak of employment, nor should it be taken at the height of unemployment; it should be taken at a period of average unemployment. Therefore, November is the best time to take it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I yield gladly to my worthy colleague.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman state why the specific date of November 12 was fixed as the date for the taking of this census?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. The Department of Agriculture wanted November 15, but inasmuch as November 12 falls on a Monday that date was chosen so the work could start at the beginning of a week.

The proposed census will provide temporary employment to over 100,000 jobless and in that way it will aid a considerable part of the people.

The census will cost $7,540,000, which will be taken from the money heretofore appropriated for Civil Works. This is indeed proper, because the census will give employment to about 100,000 white-collar workers and therefore is quite suitable as a Civil Works project.

THIS CENSUS WILL SERVE AS THE FOUNDATION FOR UP-TO-DATE UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

Dr. Lubin, the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, informed the committee that after this census gives us the number of unemployed as of November 12, 1934, the Department of Labor expects to be able to keep this data up to date so that it will be able to make fairly accurate estimates of the number of unemployed. This is highly desirable and, indeed, necessary.

The census bill is one of the most important measures that we can pass. A census of unemployment, employment, occupation, and population is vital. It will provide the basic and fundamental information which is absolutely essential before there can be an intelligent solution of the unemployment problem. Without a proper solution of this problem there can be no lasting recovery.

The welfare of the unemployed, the welfare of the country demands the passage of this bill.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate how futile it is to oppose a bill of this character, providing such a lot of juicy political plums for distribution by the Democratic majority.

Stripped of all camouflage, this is probably the boldest attempt that has ever been made by any political party in the history of this country to pay 105,000 Democratic political election-day workers out of the Federal Treasury, and that is practically everything there is in this bill, and every man on each side of this House knows it. In the 150 years' history of this country we have never taken an off-year census of this kind for purely political reasons, and no majority but the present one has ever had the temerity to bring forward such an indefensible expenditure of the people's money.

I listened very carefully to the statement of the chairman of the committee in an effort to learn the reasons for the taking of this census. The gentleman told us very plainly what the bill will do, but he assigned very few reasons why it should be done at this time, and, of course, the reason was there is no real argument to be presented for it but a political one. It certainly is very peculiar that it should happen, out of the whole 12 months of the year, to decide upon November of this year as the time for the taking of this census. What do you suppose was the reason? I leave it to you to answer. The report of the committee states that the purpose of the census is to assist in forming plans for unemployment relief this winter. The same report also states that it will take probably 4 weeks to complete the census. If you start taking it in November and it takes 4 weeks to complete it, it will probably be 6 weeks or 8 weeks before it is taken and you will get the report next July, a fine time to have information to use in employment relief during the winter following the taking of the census. Therefore it cannot be of any use for the avowed purpose of its proponents, but it will accomplish the hidden object of helping to pay Democratic election-day expenses.

There is not a single reason for taking this unemployment census at this time, because it is being taken and has been taken by three separate and distinct agencies. I shall read an excerpt from the report of the C.W.A. As a matter of fact, they have just completed a census similar to this and a short time ago laid off about 400 employees engaged in that work practically all the time for the last year.

The report of the C.W.A. says:

> The Federal Emergency Relief Administration is planning a census of unemployment relief necessary to obtain certain elementary information concerning all families and nonresident families of persons receiving funds from public funds for the purpose of forming a comprehensive plan.

That is practically the same language that is used in the bill that is pending before us. In addition to this, the bill that was passed in the early part of the Seventy-third Congress establishing a national employment system provides for exactly the same thing provided for in this bill.

> This employment bureau also assists in coordinating the public employment offices throughout the country and increasing their usefulness by developing and prescribing minimum standards, etc., and providing administrative and statistical procedure, furnishing information as to opportunities for employment, and much other information of value in the operation of this system.

That is another law which provides for doing practically the same thing that you are doing under the provisions of this bill. In the third place, Miss Perkins, Secretary of Labor, announced that she was going to reorganize the entire Department and put specific people to doing exactly the same work that you propose to do under this special census at this time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SNELL. There are three distinct Federal agencies doing this work now, all filled with Democratic employees, and still you have the nerve to ask for a fourth one. If there is any need for a fourth one, except to get these 105,000 Democratic jobs, I should like to have some gentleman tell me what it is.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. No; I decline to yield at this time. You gentlemen on that side know I would yield if I could secure time. I would stay here an hour; but under your new liberal system you will not allow us any time to discuss a bill, so I cannot yield in my limited time.

May I call attention to the record of the administration and their job propensities? Here is a report of the Democratic Civil Service Commission, published in the papers of last night or this morning. The report says that there are 644,108 now in executive units under the Civil Service. This number, according to the report, is within 47,000 of the top notch that we had at the time of the war. It also says it is about 81,000 more people than were employed by the Government when the Democratic Party went into power on March 4, 1933, and this does not include either the judicial or legislative branch, or the million and a quarter extra employees outside the regular establishment.

That is a report of your own Commission; and you are the party that went before this country and said you were going to do away with the extra employees of the Government in Washington. You were going to have an economy administration. You were going to save the people's money. You were going to do away with all the extra bureaus and commissions. You have a fine record on these lines.

Why, you have established more bureaus and commissions than anyone else ever heard of in the history of the American Government. In addition to that, you have 80,000 extra employees today over what you had in Washington and on the civil-service rolls at the time you took over the Government. That is your economy administration.

Even in the face of that, you have the nerve to come in here and say, "We want these 105,000 extra employees to use during the month of November to make sure of carrying the congressional elections." Perhaps you may fool part of the people part of the time, but it is my judgment that you cannot fool all the people all the time. There has not been brought forward one single excuse for wasting this money in this way; and I hope the House will refuse to pass this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, may I say to you on the Democratic side that it is indeed fitting that you should now cheer, because with the coming of this bill you have whipped the so-called "Republican filibuster" of last week. You did not whip the Republican filibuster when you passed the gag rule. All that you whipped with the unprecedented gag rule was the Frazier-Lemke bill, the McLeod bill, the Connery bill, and the Withrow railroad bill. This is the bill, along with other worthless and extravagant legislation, which we tried to stop. You may say we were doing it by filibuster. Very well. It is the only power at our command. We have only 114 Members.

This bill is iniquitous and should not pass any House of Representatives. We cannot stop it by our votes, because we do not have a sufficient number.

Let us analyze this bill and see how iniquitous it is. May I take the words of your own chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER], when he said a few moments ago that this bill would not cost the taxpayers anything.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield? I made no such statement, and the RECORD will disprove the gentleman's statement.

Mr. McGUGIN. Did the gentleman not say that the money had already been appropriated and was going to be taken out of the Public Works fund?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes. I said there would be no additional appropriation. The gentleman will please quote me right and quote me properly, if he quotes me at all. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. The gentleman's statement now is that it will cost the taxpayers no additional money, but that you are going to take it out of the money already appropriated for relief. All right, you are going to take money that should be spent to feed hungry people. You are going to take the milk and bread from the hungry and use it to pay your political debts. [Applause.]

When you pass this bill you are not running over the Republicans. You are running over the poor and distressed of this country. That is the statement of your own chairman because you are asking for this money from an appropriation which has been made to feed the distressed of the country.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. No. I do not yield to the gentleman.

No party ever went before the people of this country with a better platform than your party did 2 years ago, and today I beg of you to keep some faith with your platform. If you keep faith with the first paragraph of your platforms, you cannot pass this bill. I quote from the first paragraph of the last Democratic platform:

> We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government.

This new deal in legislation does some great things. It is great at the art of division and multiplication. We have found that under the gag rule you are able to make Monday include Tuesday, or, in other words, make Monday do for both Monday and Tuesday. We are experiencing that situation today. Today is the calendar day of Tuesday but is still the legislative day of Monday. You are able to declare 148 Members present to be a quorum of 218, and you are able to spend under this bill $7,000,000,000 the week after election, under the guise of doing something for the unemployed in this country; when the truth is you are taking it from money which has been appropriated heretofore to buy clothing and food for the hungry and the distressed of this country. I appeal to the Democratic side of this House to respect its own party platform, uphold it for once, and if you will not do that, then I appeal to your humanitarianism, reach not your hands into the funds of charity and use that money for political loot. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Hoover and the Republican Party starved the people and refused to feed them, and humanity and conscience dictate that the Democratic Party feed those who are or were hungry—yes, starving—and furnish employment for those who lost their work by reason of Republican stupidity and misrule. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] stated that the filibuster was to prevent the passage of this bill. The bills advocated were, the gentleman from Kansas states, supported by them merely to gain publicity. A majority of the Republicans did not want to vote for them because the bills were contrary to the principles of the Republican Party.

The gentleman stated that we are responsible for defeating some of the bills. All those measures, or nearly all of them he mentioned, were camouflage and pure bunk with which you were fourflushing to the country. He knows that the Steagall bill we passed will aid depositors of Federal Reserve member banks as well as depositors of State banks. The McLeod bill would have helped only depositors in Federal Reserve banks. The Democratic Party has passed legislation that is honest, that is in the interest of the whole country. I feel that these repeated and unjustifiable charges on your part will not avail.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN], the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HESS] charge that this proposed measure would create and give the Democrats a hundred thousand jobs. Personally, I wish that were true, because, up to now at least, most of the departments, the A.A.A., the P.W.A., and the C.C.C., are, unfortunately, manned by a majority of Republicans, which accounts for some of the inefficiency in these departments and independent agencies.

If the gentlemen would read the bill they would learn that the provisions of the act of 1929, which is legislation of a Republican Congress, must be followed in the making of these appointments. The gentlemen should know that November 12, when this work would begin, will be a week after the election, so that this bill is not for political purposes, but is to provide a proper method of securing data as to unemployment and movements of the masses since 1930, due to the Hoover crash of 1929. This work is requested not only by the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Agriculture, but also by colleges and universities, labor organizations, agricultural organizations, and commercial associations throughout the whole United States. If it will give employment, as I hope it will, to 100,000 for from 2 to 4 weeks, something at least will have been done for the white-collar men who have suffered most and complained least.

The Republicans complain of the cost of this proposed census. The last census, which was taken under a Republican administration, cost about $45,000,000. This census, which is partially provided for in the act of 1929, will not cost more than $4,000,000 additional; in fact, all in all, about $7,540,000, or one-sixth of what it cost during the Republican administration of 1930.

The gentleman from Kansas also charges that this sum will be taken from the appropriation to feed the people, and again he is wrong, as not a cent will be taken from the relief fund, but the money will be taken from the Public Works allotment and will reduce the cost of relief by the amount that will be expended in this work, as this work will no doubt be done by the unemployed who are now on the relief rolls. There will in fact not be any additional expenditure.

In view of false reports in 1930, 1931, and 1932 as to the number of unemployed, when the Republican Secretary of Commerce and his assistants gave misinformation on this subject to the country in often-repeated statements saying there were only 4,000,000 or 4,500,000 out of employment, when in fact there were almost 15,000,000 or 16,000,000, this census should be taken. Notwithstanding the fact that we have placed 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 back to work, the country is entitled to know the number still unemployed, which is estimated by some at 8,000,000 and by others at 10,000,000. Moreover, the country wants to know where the unemployment is greatest and in what industries.

No, Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, this legislation is not needed by the Democrats to win the forthcoming November election, as the people are wholeheartedly with President Roosevelt; they trust him; they believe in him; and they have, also, complete confidence in the Democratic Congress, which has loyally upheld and aided him in carrying out the Democratic pledges and promises. [Applause.]

In conclusion let me say that the amount of squawking done by a few of you Republicans on the floor of this House day in and day out when you jump up and make rash statements and ridiculous charges will not help you nor your party. I feel that you Republicans would gain much more if you would join with us in helping to pass the balance of legislation recommended by the President and enable the Congress to adjourn soon than you will gain by the tactics you are pursuing. It is not to your credit but your eternal discredit to try to delay and even kill labor and other remedial legislation the President has recommended. [Applause.]

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday Senators and Representatives from the drought areas throughout the country were in conference to discuss the matter of emergency drought relief. Today a conference was held with the President, and immediately following that conference with the President of the United States you come into the House of Representatives and seek to vote out of the Treasury anywhere from seven to ten million dollars needed for food in these drought areas—yes, needed throughout the entire United States.

In the record of the hearings on this bill you will find the statement that it was not proposed to hire the unemployed as census enumerators because the Census Bureau did not think they were qualified to do this type of work, and yet all over this land there are men who are now without work and who are well qualified to do a job of this kind. To my mind it is a shameful procedure, and justifiable only on the grounds of political expediency.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, what are the facts about this matter? We have appropriated and turned over to Mr. Hopkins for relief hundreds of millions of dollars. He gave to the District of Columbia for relief for the month of April, first $800,000, then $200,000 more, making $1,000,000 for April, and he gave the District $800,000 for May, and he has allotted to the District $710,052 for June. Yet, Major Gotwals tells us that right here in Washington there are 8,000 families that have been getting relief who are not entitled to it, and Major Gotwals is causing a survey to be made, for he says that one-third of the 25,000 families in Washington who have been getting relief are not entitled to it. We will soon save enough money by cutting out the frauds to pay for this bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret I have not the time to yield to my friend. Instead of wasting that money on people who are not entitled to it, we are going to take seven and a half million dollars of this great sum of money that Mr. Hopkins has on hand and do some real good for the people with it. There will be deserving, helpless widows employed with this money, widows with little children to support, widows who have not been able to get a job for a year and who have no means of support and who must get bread and meat for their little children. They will be employed, and we will see that they get the jobs. There will be deserving heads of families who have not been able to get relief and who have not been able to get jobs for 2 or 3 years under the Hoover administration who will be given positions where they can earn an honest dollar.

Oh, the gentleman from Kansas let the cat out of the bag when he told us why the minority leader the other day, to try to kill this bill, caused the entire Journal to be read and spent 2½ hours of the time of this House reading all the names on eight roll calls from the Journal, something the Speaker of the House in his 35 years here never heard of being done before. They had us sit here for 2½ hours to read the Journal, when ordinarily it is read in 5 minutes. That is the kind of monkey business that the minority party, through their minority leader, is trying to put over on the country. If there is anything on God's earth that could cause this bill to pass by a solid Democratic vote, it ought to be that very ridiculous, partisan action of the minority leader, aided and abetted by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN]. [Laughter and applause.]

I want to say this, Mr. Speaker. I honestly believe that the American people, the needy people, will get more real, "honest-to-God" good out of this little $7,000,000 bill than they will get out of all the measures you Republicans have passed for the last 12 years. What have you done for the country? Nothing! You "busted" and starved the American people. I do not like the dole system—it is against everything I have been taught since childhood—I would rather give a man an honest job and let him earn a dollar than to give him a $100 dole when he has not earned it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] stated that this money was coming out of the relief fund given to feed the hungry.

That is not the fact. Nothing could be further from the truth. All the money necessary will come out of the Civil Works funds—money allotted for building and other projects, and not out of any money appropriated for relief—for either the feeding of the hungry or the clothing of the naked.

Now, I want to say this: If there is any one man in this House who ought not to have the audacity to talk about "feeding the hungry and clothing the naked" it is none other than the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN]. It is a late date when the gentleman pretends to concern himself with feeding the hungry. [Applause.] In June, 2 years ago, when a resolution was offered proposing that the Government sell its millions of bushels of surplus wheat to the Red Cross, so that it might be made into bread to feed the hungry, the gentleman from Kansas stood on the floor as "the champion" in leading the fight against feeding the hungry of this Nation in our States and cities. So we are justly entitled today to doubt the sincerity of the gentleman's elaborate gesticulations about the poor and the hungry. Heretofore he has shown no interest in our poor or our hungry or our unemployed. In fact, he has been the leading filibusterer against relief legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I reiterate the statement that this $7,540,000 comes out of what is called the "Hopkins C.W.A. fund", but no part of it comes out of the Hopkins relief funds. It comes out of the civil-works portion of the appropriation and not out of the relief portion of the funds.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. SNELL. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 227, nays 129, not voting 75, as follows:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. There were over 100 majority in favor of this bill. Is not there a rule that could be called up to make the bill in order, so that it could pass with only a majority vote? We ought to pass this bill tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an announcement. The gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. ROGERS, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. HARTER, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. JAMES, and the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. Goss, are on a special committee from the Committee on Military Affairs investigating purchases of property by the War Department, and I ask that they be excused for the day.

There was no objection.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following privileged report (H.Res. 420, Rept. No. 1886), for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 420

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9690, a bill to place the tobacco-growing industry on a sound financial and economic basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in the production and marketing of tobacco entering into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

AUTHORIZING DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TO BORROW FROM PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 368 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3404, a bill authorizing loans from the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for the construction of certain municipal buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. For what purpose?

Mr. BLANTON. For a question.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This rule provides that all the time shall be controlled by Members who are in favor of the resolution. That is not a fair arrangement under the House rules. There should always be heard opposition to a measure. Now, can we not agree to let the rule be passed without argument, and let 1 hour's time that was to be devoted to the rule be added to the time for general debate, and then have a fair division of the time?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It would be satisfactory to me. I do not know whether it would be to the other side or not.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are some who want to be heard on the rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. How much time will the gentleman give us on the rule?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. If the gentleman will permit me to proceed, he will find out in just a moment.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] to be yielded by him to gentlemen on that side of the aisle. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], to be yielded by him, in turn, as he sees fit to opponents of the bill. I reserve 15 minutes on this side for the proponents of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman from Michigan for or against the rule?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this measure has given the Rules Committee much concern. I do not believe that that committee at this session has given more consideration to any measure than it has to this particular one. When it first came before us it was a request to permit the District of Columbia to borrow $20,000,000 from the Public Works Administration for the purpose of building or completing certain projects in the District. Under the law of 1878 the District of Columbia cannot borrow, while every other city is borrowing and getting the benefit of the 30-percent grant. There was strong opposition to the granting of the rule, believing it would break down the principle that the District of Columbia should never incur any debt, but the arguments that were presented to the Rules Committee as to the necessity for these projects were so potent that after several hearings the Rules Committee evidenced its willingness to report out a modified bill, which provided for the borrowing of $10,750,000, as I recall the figures, for four very necessary projects. The District of Columbia has not the money to build those projects and can only get it either by appropriation by Congress or by borrowing it from the Public Works Administration. Those projects, as I remember them, are a sewage disposal system for the District of Columbia. It was presented to us that the condition of the Potomac River into which sewage empties was deplorable; that it endangered the health and lives of all the people living in the District, and the countless visitors who visit the District. That project would require about $8,000,000. There was also presented to us the necessity for a tuberculosis hospital in the District of Columbia. It was shown that the death rate from tuberculosis in the District of Columbia was third or fourth throughout the country. That, as I understand, required about $1,500,000.

Another project which we felt was necessary was the building of some kind of a wall or enclosure around Lorton Prison, Virginia. It was stated to us that that prison was originally intended for minor offenses, but it is now used for all kinds of criminals, including the most dangerous. There was a situation there of immediate necessity that should be taken care of. As I recall the four projects, there was the sewage disposal, the tuberculosis hospital, the Lorton Penitentiary, and an addition to Gallinger Hospital, which is very much overcrowded and has needed attention for years. Every city and State in the United States, as well as every possession, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, Virgin Islands, and Philippines, can, and most of them have, borrowed money from the Public Works Administration. Why should the Capital City stand in a less favorable position than Hawaii, for instance?

The District of Columbia cannot proceed without this legislation, and it should be granted to them. The District of Columbia must pay this money back, and pay it back out of taxes, because there is a provision in the bill, or there will be through an amendment, putting an additional levy of 10 cents per hundred on the tax bill to take care of the amortization of this fund, and the Rules Committee felt the situation was such that no discrimination should be made against the District of Columbia and that it should have this necessary authority to borrow this money.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to incorporate some excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I think it should be understood that the Committee on Rules declined to report a rule making in order Senate 3404, which provides that the District of Columbia may borrow $20,000,000 from the P.W.A. fund for certain improvements within the District of Columbia until a tacit agreement was reached with the Committee on the District of Columbia to eliminate certain items from the Senate bill, reducing the amount of the loan to be requested to $10,750,000 and eliminating from consideration the items relating to parks, the community center, and the schools. The House should understand that amendments are to be offered to the bill on which will reduce the amount to be asked for to $10,750,000 and eliminate those three subjects to which I have referred. With that understanding, a majority of the Committee on Rules voted to report the rule.

I can state my position in regard to the matter in a word. It seems to me that if there is any community in the United States that is able to take care of itself and to pay its way at the present time, without borrowing from P.W.A. funds, it is the District of Columbia. Everybody knows that the District of Columbia is in a class by itself, as far as economic and business conditions are concerned. Everybody knows that the tax rate in the District of Columbia is less burdensome than in any other place in the United States. There is no reason why the District of Columbia should not take care of these improvements if they are needed. It would be a very simple matter to provide for them in the regular District appropriation bill, and to raise the additional funds to take care of them in the regular way which, for any one year, would be very small. Furthermore, the items provided for in this legislation are all matters which have been before the Committee on Appropriations from time to time and are considered by that committee every year during the consideration of the annual appropriation bill for the District of Columbia. This legislation is not necessary as an authorization, because every project provided for in the bill is now authorized by law, and the only thing that is necessary to have the improvements made is to get the Committee on Appropriations to put items in the appropriation bill to take care of them. The Committee on Rules is simply going over ground which has been covered by the Committee on Appropriations. In reporting this rule it is usurping the functions of that committee. It is substituting its judgment for the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations when it says that appropriations should be made to take care of these particular items.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course the gentleman from Michigan knows that the purpose of this rule is not in any wise to attempt to influence the judgment of the House with reference to the merits of the bill. The gentleman knows the very great insistence and pressure put on our committee to give the House an opportunity to consider the bill upon its merits, and in the orderly course of things, although I think the Committee on Rules did wisely, perhaps improperly, insist on the deletion of some of these items in the original bill, it merely reported the bill to give the House an opportunity to consider it on its merits. I do not know that the gentleman is opposing the adoption of the rule—he may be, but that is all we felt we ought to do—give this House an opportunity to consider the bill, because it is a matter of very great importance as represented to us, to the citizens of the District of Columbia and adjacent Virginia.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, everything that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] says is, of course, true, but it is one of the functions of Members of Congress to resist pressure, and the same pressure is brought to bear every year upon the Committee on Appropriations. If the Committee on Rules is going to act as an appellate court to consider all the legislation brought before the regular legislative committees, then it will usurp the functions of those committees and will load itself up with a lot of extra and unnecessary work.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman speaks of the Appropriations Committee and the District of Columbia Committee and the Rules Committee. Of course, the taxpaying residents of Washington are more or less inarticulate, but is there any way by which their wishes in the premises can be ascertained? Is there any public body that can tell the committee or the House what the sentiment of the people is?

Mr. MAPES. I do not know of any community that is more articulate in pressing for legislation affecting it than is the District of Columbia. If the gentleman had ever served on the Committee on the District of Columbia, or if he had served on the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge appropriations for the District of Columbia, he would realize that no community in the United States is so articulate as is the District of Columbia in pressing constantly for appropriations and for legislation affecting the District.

I do not care to take any more time, but I repeat that this legislation is entirely unnecessary. The District of Columbia does not need to borrow from the P.W.A. Your community and mine, which are suffering much more severely by tax burdens, are not getting money from the P.W.A. funds, and if the improvements contemplated by this bill are necessary, the Committee on Appropriations can provide for them whenever it sees fit to do so.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I do not like to take any more time.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to what my distinguished colleague from Michigan has had to say; and I listened with some degree of interest to what the distinguished gentleman from Texas had to say the other day in an incidental way upon the bill that is now pending. I am rather afraid we confuse the issue on this bill, because to me it is a case of determining what the needs and the requirements of the District of Columbia are. People in this town do not differ any from the people out in my district in Illinois; they have the same needs and requirements for police protection and for fire protection; they have the same cultural requirements; they have the same requirements for sanitation and sewage disposal, and all that sort of thing.

In the very nature of things, as the District is constituted, coming under the jurisdiction of Congress, it has to come here as a supplicant and ask for the necessary appropriations with which to carry out those things which have been regarded by the Commissioners of the District and by the experts who have been hired as necessary.

The P.W.A. has allowed $40,000 with which to make a survey of the sewage-disposal needs of the District of Columbia. You know as well as I how difficult it is to get money out of the P.W.A.; and I am satisfied that Mr. Ickes, had he not regarded it necessary, would not have approved the preliminary expenditure of $40,000, bringing about the employment of three very competent sanitation engineers to determine upon the sewage-disposal needs and requirements of the District and upon the cleaning up of the Potomac River. If we do not follow this up, we simply have thrown $40,000 to the birds. I think it has been amply established by these engineers that improvement in the matter of sewage disposal is necessary. They point to pollution of the Potomac River; and I, having been interested in conservation and the prevention of stream pollution, would be heartily ashamed of myself to oppose the improvement of the sewage disposal in the District of Columbia which at the present time is contaminating one of the finest rivers in the United States of America.

The gentleman from Texas the other day stated that when George Washington lived in these parts the Potomac River was all right as a bathing place for him and others who lived in this area, and ought to be now, but I would remind the gentleman from Texas that Washington was not then a town of 487,000 inhabitants; the effluent and the offal of such a large number of people were not being pumped into that stream, contaminating it with virus to such an extent that it will kill the fish life. That is what is happening in the Potomac River right now. When competent engineers state that improvement is necessary, who am I, a Member of Congress from Illinois, to come here and give indifferent attention to the business of the District of Columbia, like most of the members of the committee do—and I say this with no sense of shame because we can give only as much attention to District affairs as time will permit—who am I to challenge the judgment of the engineers, to challenge the judgment of the Commissioners who have been appointed to look after the affairs of the District, to say that they do not need it, and, therefore, they cannot have the money? I say to you it is eminently unfair. An anomalous situation exists in the relationship between the people of the District and the Congress. They came to our committee the other day with a proposal to change the name of Four-and-a-half Street to Fourth Street; and in order that they might do it the Congress of the United States had to pass a bill to that effect. They came before our committee the other day to ask a waiving of the requirement for fire escapes on two-story buildings occupied by three families; and to effectuate this a bill to that effect must be passed by the Congress of the United States. The calendar of the District of Columbia is piled 2 feet high with bills of all kinds for things that are needed. The people of the District are articulate, as the gentleman from Michigan said; they have to be; they have no city council, they have no way by which they can provide and appropriate; every need of the District of Columbia has to be registered in the Committee on the District of Columbia, and if it involves an appropriation it must further be passed upon by the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee.

Under circumstances such as I have outlined, they have come to us and asked for $10,750,000 with which to build a sewage-disposal plant which the engineers say is necessary; to add to the protection of Lorton where are confined some of the hardened criminals; to provide funds with which to build a tuberculosis hospital.

It was stated the other day that they did not need a tuberculosis hospital in the District of Columbia, and photographs were exhibited in the well of the House to show the recent completion of a tuberculosis hospital; but let me remind the Members of the House that that hospital is strictly a children's hospital. In the District of Columbia they seek to segregate adult sufferers of tuberculosis from child sufferers. That is why they want the additional funds with which to build a tuberculosis hospital in the Capital City of the Nation, a city which has one of the highest death rates from tuberculosis in the United States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I shall address myself for just a few minutes to the merits of the bill. I do not want to take the position of opposing my colleagues on the Rules Committee in presenting this rule and asking that permission be given for the consideration of the measure. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the adoption of the rule. My opposition is to the bill.

I have never been able to find justification, moral or otherwise, for the Congress placing upon the General Government any part of the cost of the government of the District of Columbia. It has always seemed strange to me that Members yield to the pressure that is brought to bear by the people of the District.

The argument just made was a plea for equal treatment of the District. May I say that the most-favored people in all this world are the people of the District of Columbia. The people who get the most out of the General Government are the people of the District of Columbia; and this is another effort to get something for nothing. They speak of the need for these projects that are outlined in the bill. If the District wants them, then the people of the District ought to pay for them; but this bill is to enable them to get what they want at the cost of the people in the outlying sections of the country.

It is said that we should permit the District to borrow, just as we permit the States to borrow. Let me remind you in this connection that in the administration of the relief funds the District has been dealt with upon the basis of its inability to borrow; and, as a result of this condition, the city of Washington, with a population of something over 480,000, has in many instances obtained more than three times as much money as the people of any one State in a group comprising half the States of the Union. When the people of a State want something they dig down in their pockets and pay for it; but the people of the District of Columbia want the people of the other sections to provide their needs for them free of cost.

If you want to test the sincerity of the District in its insistence upon the adoption of this resolution, write into the bill a provision to the effect that the 30-percent grant shall not apply. If you do that, you will find the people of the District fleeing from the proposal.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. Speaker, let me again call attention to the fact that the District enjoys every advantage over other cities of the country of comparable size, or, in fact, of any size. The city of Washington owes no public debt. The entire revenue derived from taxation is applied to the cost of government and to the extension of improvements; whereas when your city or my city levies a tax, something approaching 25 percent of the full amount of the tax revenues goes to the extinguishment of carrying charges on bonded indebtedness. This situation does not apply to the District. This is a grab on the part of the District of Columbia.

Just how you can justify yourselves, coming from distant States, in taxing your people to set up favorable conditions for the people of Washington I am unable to understand. When you gentlemen come to deal with the District you ought not to forget the needs of the people back home. Your people have been suffering for 4 years conditions the like of which was never experienced before. The people of the District have never realized that a terrible calamity has befallen this country and that the people in outlying sections have been suffering the agonies of Hades.

They come here today and ask you to further penalize the people in the mines and in the fields by taxing them to make improvements here in the District. The tax rate in the District of Columbia is lower than in any city in the entire world. If the people want these improvements, let them tax themselves to pay for them, and not Congress tax the people in the States to meet costs.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States is a town council for the District of Columbia. They have no privileges and no right to legislate upon any matter until they come to us. Every other municipality in the United States that desires money for a project in order to help the unemployment situation could pass an ordinance through its town council, present its bond securities to the Public Works Administration, and borrow money for the emergency. If the District of Columbia is allowed the same privilege as every other municipality, it will have to be upon the granting of that authority by the Congress.

There is unemployment here the same as there is unemployment in every other city of the United States. It is true a great many tourists come here, which increases the business of the District, but the District of Columbia is also the sojourn of many of the tramps, wanderers, and unemployed, that come in for various reasons.

Contrary to the views of the gentleman from Georgia, that this penalizes the entire United States, it merely brings the District of Columbia upon an equality with every other municipality and section of the United States. It is true that the Federal Treasury contributes a certain part, but under this proposal the District of Columbia is proposing to borrow money like every other municipality, and is willing to pledge the property of the District to pay back this money. It is true a gratuity of 30 percent will be given here just as is given to every other municipality; but is there any reason why any different treatment should be given to the District of Columbia and the city of Washington as a municipality than is given to your home city or my home city back in the States? If the District of Columbia, through its government, is willing to pledge its property to pay back in the future the money that is needed for necessary projects in this emergency to help the unemployment situation, we ought to divert from the usual custom of appropriating money, in which the Federal Government makes its full contribution, and allow them this privilege, upon their pledge, of borrowing money to put over these projects during this emergency, and help unemployment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. GREENWOOD. These projects include a TB hospital to cost $2,000,000. The death rate from tuberculosis in the District is higher than in 50 other cities near its size in the United States. Six hundred beds are needed; 300 beds are provided.

There is provision for the construction of a wall around the penitentiary at Lorton. Lorton was designed for 800 prisoners and there are now 1,200 confined there. Some of the worst prisoners in the District have been sent to Federal penitentiaries on account of the overcrowded condition at Lorton. We should permit the District of Columbia to take care of their own prisoners if it wants to borrow for this purpose.

For Gallinger Hospital there is allowed $750,000. This hospital was planned for 500 patients and there are now 700, many of whom are sleeping in the halls, corridors, and elsewhere.

The District of Columbia proposes to borrow this money, just like every other community, in order to increase its hospital facilities, among other things, and they should be allowed to do this.

There is $8,000,000 for a sewage-disposal plant in order to purify the Potomac River. The District should be allowed to borrow money to preserve the health of the people residing here.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] the remainder of my time.

Mr. MAPES. May I also yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] 5 minutes to dispose of as he sees fit?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if there are any such, the most obscure, unknown, inactive Member of this House, by speaking for this bill today, could get his picture on the front pages of the Washington papers with a big write-up about his great ability. Those of us who have to speak against it in the interest of our constituents back home must withstand the vicious attacks made upon us by all of these Washington newspapers, who in every way possible misrepresent us, and we must also face the darts of every Member here who is trying to put this bill through.

Here are the facts: Back in 1878 the District government, which had been allowed to run loose by the Congress, had gotten hopelessly into debt. Its affairs had been mismanaged. There was waste, extravagance, graft, and corruption in the management of the business affairs of the District of Columbia.

The Congress took charge of things and passed a law in 1878 making it a serious offense afterwards for the Commissioners to ever borrow another dollar. The act provides a punishment of 10 years in the penitentiary and a $10,000 fine if they ever put this District in debt again. It has not been in debt since that time. It has been running on a cash basis ever since 1878. It does not owe one dollar now.

This is merely an attempt to start that bunkum all over again. That is the reason your Rules Committee hesitated, and that is the reason that notwithstanding the pressure behind this bill there was a closely divided vote of 6 to 5 when they finally voted this rule out, providing they would agree to reduce the Senate bill from $20,000,000 to $10,750,000.

I want you to remember that this $20,000,000 bill was passed by the Senate wholly without consideration. So that this will not be controverted, I now quote from the Washington Times of April 27, 1934, the following, printed in box-car headlines:

SENATE PASSES D.C. LOAN BILL IN 5 MINUTES—PROCEDURE, ENGINEERED BY SENATOR KING, RARELY PERMITTED
